TO OUR READERS,

ON CONCLUDING THE TWENTIETH VOLUME.

THE conclusion of the TWENTIETH VOLUME of the SPORTING MAGAZINE, gives us the opportunity of again making an acknowledgment of gratitude to our numerous Friends and Subscribers. The confidence we feel upon the occasion, does not diminish but increase with the increasing years in which our efforts have been used for the information and amusement of the Public.

Our panegyrists have been many, our censors very few, and our imitators by far the greatest in number; all, however, admitting, that our constant endeavours to mix the useful with the sweet, have not been devoid of success. We have the most unequivocal testimony, that the Man of Pleasure, Enterprise, and Spirit, still continues to find an useful companion and memorialist in the annals preserved and concentrated in the SPORTING MAGAZINE.

On the score of improvement, we intend to begin the TWENTY-FIRST VOLUME with very superior ENGRAVINGS, a few fine PROOFS of each will be reserved every Month for Amateurs fond of FINE PRINTS. The Work will likewise be printed on Fine Wover Paper, with every judicious attention to the Printing, &c.

In the account of the Eclipse Mare, in our last Magazine, the names of the Gentlemen to whom she severally belonged, should have been William Herrick, (not Horrick) Esq. and Hurt (not Hart) Sitwell Esq.

The FRONTISPIECE for the present VOLUME (the TWENTIETH) is a just representation of SMITHFIELD HORSE-MARKET on a FRIDAY. All who know the various descriptions of Horses brought to this Market on a Friday, will allow the Correctness of the ENGRAVING. Good saleable high-priced Horses are not to be met with at this market, but numerous of the middling and inferior kinds are always to be bought. It is all a chance here: sometimes a Horse is bought cheap, and turns out well; and sometimes the buyer finds himself completely taken in. The best way in buying is to take a good judge with you, and the dealers, knowing such to be as cunning as themselves, are the less inclined to attempt imposition.

The subject of the VIGNETTE to the Engraved TITLE-PAGE is, WOOD GROUSE.

Pontefract Races.

AT Pontefract Races, for the present year, the Sweepstakes was run for by three horses, and won by Mr. Croft's bay colt by Traveller. In running for the first heat, at the two-mile turn, the Traveller colt fell, and T. Todd, who rode him, was much stunned by the fall.

As soon as possible, a boy, of the name of Howard, (who weighed about 7st. 7lb.) was put upon the colt, without either whip or spur, but having the stable-door key in his pocket, used it for a whip. He was, however, distanced about sixty yards above the usual length (two hundred and forty yards); but as neither of the flags were dropped, as usual, against distanced horses, a dispute arose whether he was entitled to start again.—The Stewards, after consulting with several gentlemen, were of opinion, that in consequence of the flags not being dropped, Mr. Croft had a right to start his colt again; which he did; won the two next heats, received the Plate, and the bets were paid accordingly.

Denbigh Assizes.

AT the last Denbighshire Assizes, a cause of great importance to the sporting world came to be tried The plaintiff was Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart. and the defendant a Mr. Brereton, a wealthy farmer, living in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff. The only question to be determined was, whether, in consequence of permission having been given to others, the defendant was intitled to course over the plaintiff's lands, after having been warned off. The Chief Justice, in summing up the evidence observed, that as the counsel for the plaintiff had disclaimed any intention of seeking more than nominal damages, and asked a verdict only to ascertain the right, he was relieved from saying any thing on that subject; and lamented that the defendant by persisting to course after having had notice, and by refusing the terms of compromise offered to him by Sir Watkin previously to the action, had rendered this appeal to a Court of Justice unavoidable. His Lordship added, that in the long course of his experience, he had rarely known such actions improperly brought; and that the present one was the more proper, as letters produced in Court which had been written by the defendant since the commencement of the action, and were insisted on by his counsel as amounting to an apology, did not in effect contain any promise that the defendant would in future forbear to repeat the trespass. The jury accordingly found a verdict for the plaintiff, with one shilling damages; and the Judge certifying that the trespass was committed after notice, the whole costs must be paid by the defendant.

Subscription Pack of Hounds.

THE slack-twisted operations of a certain pack of fox hounds last season, leave but very little hope of spirited regeneration.—The half of the Subscribers do not easily reconcile themselves to the finding all the money; nor is it a pleasant, though it may be a new idea, of leaving a huntsman, horses, and pack of hounds, in pawn. Not so with the packs North and East of the City, where "Firm" is a good huntsman, and "Abraham Newland" an excellent whipper-in; here are no symptoms of starvation, the hounds are well fed, and the horses in high condition.

Sailing Match.

SOUTHAMPTON, SEPT. 17.

THE sailing match last Saturday afforded better sport than on any preceding year.—Mr. Rose, sen. Collector of Customs at this port, together with a number of other gentlemen, were accommodated on board the Rose cutter to see the contest. Nineteen vessels started at eleven o'clock, when a brisk side-wind prevailed. The Trial, John Bryer, gained the first prize, six guineas, being exactly four hours in the accomplishment. At the moment he turned the stationed vessel, after a few minutes excessive storm, a dead calm ensued, which totally discomfited the followers. Two of them ran aground, who otherwise would have had a fair chance for the two other principal prizes. However, after a lapse of more than two hours, the Two Brothers, Charles Chapman, weathered the station, and gained three guineas, and was soon followed by the Jane, John Diaper, who had two guineas. The others were allowed one guinea each. But we must not neglect to commemorate the humane disposition of William Cooper, of the Mary Ann, who was very forward on the return of the second round, but instantly backed sail, and stood firm, to preserve three men who upset in a pleasure boat, and we are happy to say he succeeded in his laudable effort, by saving all that were on board, who must otherwise have perished, as they were a great way from land, opposite Hythe. The Margrave of Anspach's beautiful yacht, Mr. Fitzgerald's, &c. were loaded with ladies and gentlemen to behold the contest, together with a vast assemblage of fashionables on the beach. A band of music was on board the Rose cutter.

Ninon Lenclos, and her favourite Raton,

[From the French of M. Mercier.]

THIS favourite was a small dog, taperly and elegantly formed, with yellow hair. Wherever this celebrated lady, so courted for the graces of her wit, and the goodness of her understanding, was invited, Raton was sure to be her constant companion. She placed him in an elegant little basket near her plate, and he was literally, as this Historiette will shew, her officer of health. He maintained most strictly that regimen of his mistress, which preserved her beauty, her good humour, and her health, to the advanced age of nearly a hundred years. He did not suffer her to make use of coffee, of ragouts, or of liqueurs.

Raton suffered quietly to pass him the soup, the bouilli, and the roti, but if his mistress seemed inclined to touch the ragouts, he growled, fixed his eyes upon her, and sternly interdicted interdicted the use of these enticing dishes. A discourse seemingly took place between them, when, after many remonstrances, the Doctor was always implicitly obeyed. Some of the entremets did not excite all his severity, but those from which the odour of spices intimated any thing of danger, were absolutely proscribed.

Our attentive Doctor saw from his basket the different services pass and repass, without even coveting the leg of a fowl. He was not a physician preaching temperance, and, at the same time, a glutton at table. When the desert came, however, he sprung quickly from his basket, gamboled on the cloth, paid his compliments to the ladies, and received in return for his caresses a few macaroons, of which two or three satisfied his appetite.

He permitted the use of fruit and sugar at discretion, but of coffee his disapprobation was formal and express. His eyes began to sparkle with anger; but was a bottle of liqueur opened, he pressed against his mistress as if some great danger was approaching. He took the small glass into his mouth, and hid it most carefully in his basket. If Ninon feigned to touch the forbidden nectar, our little Sangrado began a furious growl. If she insisted, he got into a violent rage, and every person present laughed to see so great a hypocratic choler in so small a body.

"Doctor," Ninon used to say, "will you permit me at least to drink a glass of water?" At these words his anger disappeared, and he wagged his tail as a sign of reconciliation. As a farther token of approbation, he drank out of the same glass, accepted and ate a biscuit, and then by a thousand capers shewed his joy, on finding that the repast was closed in conformity to his orders, and that it was not to shorten the precious days of his lovely mistress and inseparable friend!

Beauties! who refuse nothing at table, spite of all our remonstrances, you stand in need of such a guardian; but the dog of Ninon was an unique like herself. This handsome governor, so loving, and yet so austere, is stuffed at the Cabinet of Natural History. Go and pay to him a visit, and on the sight of his inanimate remains, recognise and respect his faithful and protecting genius!—(Clef du Cabinet.)

Dr. Von Isaac Slaukenbergius.

THE following whimsical Handbill was distributed at the Preston Masquerade, by Dr. Bardsley, of Manchester, in the character of a Quack Doctor:

"Thesaurum & Talentum ne abscondas in agro."

Hide not your talents from the public eye,
Nor let your treasures in your coffers lie.

The justly far-famed and highly celebrated Doctor Von Isaac Slaukenbergius, High German, Hebrew Doctor; seventh son of a seventh son, unborn Doctor, educated at twelve universities, and who has travelled through fifty-three kingdoms, and been Counsellor to Counsellors of several Monarchs; takes this public method of announcing his arrival at the present period of the celebration of that renowned Gala, the Guild, at Preston.

The Doctor submits to a discerning public, the following cursory statement of a few of those rare medical secrets, which he has discovered, in consequence of his great pains, long travels, and nocturnal lucubrations:

His Panagion Outacousticon, or Grand Specific against Deafness.

Imprimis.

—Imprimis, Were it possible to exhibit a man so deaf, that if he had been present at Nelson's cannonade, at the Victory of the Nile, he could not have heard the report; yet, these infallible Drops would restore his auditory faculty, and render him as acutely sensible to sounds, as a late Naval Aëronaut, who could clearly distinguish, at the distance of ten thousand feet from the earth, the lowing of herds! the chirping of birds!! and even the squeaking of field-mice!!!

2dly. His Pillulæ Balsamicæ, or Anti-Tussient Pills, — which are compounded of such nice and singular ingredients, that any patient, who regularly goes through a course of them, in sixteen boxes, is rendered so invulnerable to catching cold, as to enable him to lie up to his chin in water, during the winter season; or to cover himself over with snow, for a fortnight together, in an absolute state of nudity; and yet if he coughs, within forty years from the date of either of these experiments, the Doctor will be content to lose his reputation. Let any person, who distrusts the virtue of this incomparable medicine, undergo the above trials, and if he be not rendered insensible to cold, for forty years afterwards—the Doctor repeats, that he will give up all pretensions to a knowledge in physic.

3dly His Guttæ Mirabiles, or Wonderful Drops.—These drops are a sovereign remedy against the accumulation of all tumours of an aqueous or flatulent kind. Let any person in a dropsy be produced, who has got as much water in his abdomen as would fill the great tun at Heidlebergh, (the Doctor challenges any one to bring forward such a person, as he would ride two thousand miles himself to see the sight) and let him only take three of these drops, on sugar, fasting, in a morning, the Doctor engages, in a short time, to reduce him to the compass of the Starved Apothecary; so that the integuments of his body shall wrap around him, like " the skin of a withered-apple John."

4thly. His Sympathetic Tractors, or Metallic Conundrum. —— The Doctor justly claims to himself the invention of Metallic Tractors while he resided at the Court of the monarch of Pegu.

The King had unfortunately swallowed a knife, which the ignorant physicians of his Court intended to dissolve by aqua-fortis. Struck with horror at the injury likely to arise to the coats of his Majesty's stomach from this highly-corrosive fluid, the Doctor invented a Sympathetic Tractor, of such energetic powers, that, by gently drawing it along the surface of the body, it attracted the dangerous weapon, to where it might be safely and expeditiously extracted; which operation was performed to the no small joy and surprise of his Majesty and all the Royal Family! This wonderful experiment laid the foundation for many others, which have demonstrated (at the moderate price of only Five Guineas) the sympathetic attraction, subsisting between metals and maladies; and likewise the transmutation (by a new kind of alchemy) of the baser into the more precious metals.

N. B. The Doctor begs leave to acquaint the ladies, that he gives advice, with the most scrupulous secresy and delicacy, on every subject connected with the preservation, restoration, or augmention, of female beauty. He is in the possession of an excellent cosmetic water, which totally eradicates freckles, sun-burn, or pimples; and a curious carnation pomatum, to plump and colour the lips.—He can make red hair as dark as ebony, ny, and shapes the eye-brows to a miracle; alters high or low foreheads, so as to rival the genuine antique, or facial line of beauty. Has a never-failing remedy for offensive breaths; a rich water, that compels the hair to luxuriate in wanton ringlets; and a most delicate paste, to smooth and whiten the hands, neck and bosom, so as to fascinate all beholders.

The Doctor's hours of consultation at his lodgings, the Black Bull Inn, at Preston, are from nine to twelve in the morning, every day in the week, except on the real Sabbath, called Saturday.

Account of the Ascension of
M. GARNERIN, with his BALLOON,
And his Descent
By a PARACHUTE,
On Tuesday, September 21, 1802.

THE Balloon, Parachute, and Apparatus, were removed, on the morning above-mentioned from the Pantheon to St. George's Parade, North-Audley-street, Grosvenor-square; and at half past one o'clock the process of filling commenced. When completed, a Pilot Balloon, as it is called, was first launched: it ascended rapidly in a N. E. direction, and in seven minutes was completely out of sight. The parachute, which was fixed at the bottom of the large balloon, appeared in the shape of a large petticoat of white canvas, depending from a hoop. Beneath this was a basket, or rather a tube of wicker work, covered with red canvas, in which the adventurer took his place. At ten minutes before six, the aëronaut gave the signal of departure. The balloon ascended majestically; and Garnerin waving his flag, was loudly applauded: it took the same direction as the pilot balloon. In ten minutes he had arisen to a height of more than four thousand feet; at six precisely he cut the rope, and the parachute was seen to separate from the balloon, and to descend with the utmost velocity. A scream of terror was at the moment heard from every part. During some seconds, nothing but a falling object could be perceived, and that but indistinctly.

The parachute was then seen to expand, and formed a half globe, with the car suspended below it, and descended very regularly; but by degrees the car, with M. Garnerin in it, began to swing like a pendulum, till it vibrated to near forty-five degrees on each side the perpendicular, and continued thus to swing, till it sunk so as to become invisible from the ground where he ascended.

M. Garnerin several times appeared higher than the parachute. Had it fallen an inch or two more, it would have instantly collapsed, and he must have been dashed to atoms. He would have descended with the velocity of a cannon-ball. The swinging of itself was tremendous. The rope seemed to lengthen to near forty feet, and he made a complete vibration almost every second. One part of the curve was so rapid, that the eye could scarcely follow the motion. The effect produced, was according to the various characters and constitutions of those who were present. There was a general shriek among the women, and several fainted away; the men seemed fully to participate in their feelings, though few of them exhibited such strong symptoms of emotion. At the moment of separation, an immense quantity of sand fell, which could be discovered forming a thin cloud nearly for a quarter of a mile. In the shock produced by the fall of the car before the parachute was extended extended, the sand bags might have been thrown out. With a few pounds more weight, M. Garnerin would certainly have descended in a perpendicular direction, and would have run no danger. It is possible that he might produce this oscillation that his descent might be more gradual.

He passed through seven times the space he would have done if he had come down in a right line, and he was three or four times longer in descending.

As he approached the earth, the motion became more steady. When he was only five hundred feet high, people supposed that he could no longer be in any danger. Still the greatest anxiety prevailed till the news arrived that M. Garnerin had alighted in safety.

At seven minutes after six o'clock the parachute reached the ground, in a field of Mr. Harrison's, the cow-keeper, adjoining to St. Pancras burying ground. It descended rather rapidly, and M. Garnerin appeared very sick, and staggered greatly at getting out of the car, from the effect of the very rapid swaying he had experienced in his descent, which, he said, was at one time so violent as to deprive him of sensation. Some friends of his were soon collected on the spot, and secured the parachute, and M. Garnerin very soon after mounted a horse, and rode off towards North Audley-street, with his flag in his hand, and reached the ground at ten minutes past seven, with no other hurt but a slight bruise on his leg in getting out of the car. A boy standing in the road near Pancras was knocked down by the horsemen who followed, and we are sorry to add was much hurt.

The balloon was no sooner separated from the parachute, than it rolled over, having now no ballast, and rose rapidly, shaping its course nearly over the ground, and so high as scarcely to be visible, till eighteen minutes after six, when it was no longer to be discerned. The balloon was not heard of till Thursday, when M. Garnerin received a letter from Mr. Abraham Harding, of Frensham Mill, three miles from Farnham, in Surry, informing him that it fell near that place on the 22d, and was then safe in his custody.

From the perilous situation of M. Garnerin, at one time, we have no doubt but he was very far from thinking himself safe: the Frenchman, however, on the contrary, says,—"I cut the cord. My balloon rose, and I felt myself precipitated with a velocity which was checked by the sudden unfolding of my parachute. I saw that all my calculations were just, and my mind remained calm and serene. I endeavoured to modulate my gravitation, and the oscillation which I experienced increased in proportion as I approached the breeze that blows in the middle regions; nearly ten minutes had elapsed, and I felt that the more time I took in descending, the safer I should reach the ground. At length I perceived thousands of persons, some on horseback, others on foot, following me. I came near the earth, and, after one bound, I landed, and quitted the parachute, without any shock or accident."

According to M. Garnerin's calculation, he had been to the height of four thousand one hundred and fifty-four French feet.

SPORTING BIOGRAPHY.

EARL GROSVENOR.

THURSDAY morning, August the 5th, died, Earl Grosvenor, after an illness of two months, which did not, however, confine his Lordship till of late. His health being very weak, he resided at a house at Earl's-court, Kensington, the air in that quarter being mild, the same as at Brompton. Although his Lordship had been ill, his death was unexpected, he appearing in tolerable health, but weakly.

By his death, one of the largest properties in the country descends to his eldest son, Lord Belgrave, who will go up to the House of Peers, and leave a vacancy in the representation of the House of Commons. The late Earl was a great sportsman, and his loss will be very much regretted on the Turf.

He was the son of Sir Robert Grosvenor, and the first Peer of his family, being raised to that rank in 1761. He was created an Earl by Mr. Pitt, in 1784. He was born in June, 1731, and married in 1764, Henrietta, daughter of Thomas Vernon, by his wife, daughter of the Earl of Strafford. —Henrietta, his wife, forming an illicit connection with the late Duke of Cumberland, brother of his present Majesty, his Lordship brought an action in the Court of King's Bench against that Prince, for Crim. Con. and obtained a verdict with Ten Thousand Pounds damages. His Lordship endeavoured afterwards to obtain a divorce, but his Lady producing evidence of adultery on the part of her husband, the divorce was never obtained. This occurred some time about the year 1769.

By the death of the Earl, the Turf loses one of its oldest and greatest supporters. His training stables contained more horses than those of any other sportsman, and were all of his own breed: indeed so great was his stock, that many others were supplied from his stud. He had named no less than six colts (by one horse, his favourite, John Bull) in the Derby Stakes next year, and his nominations were equally numerous in most of the great Sweepstakes and Subscriptions at York, Ascot, Brighton, Lewes, Stamford, and Newmarket, where his engagements continued for many years, all of which must now of course be void. —It was in a match between his Lordship's colt by Gimcrack, and the late Earl of Abingdon's Cardinal York, that Mr. Elwes is reported to have lent the late nobleman three thousand guineas to make his stakes: the bets were seven to two in his favour, and he must have permitted his antagonist to have walked over, but for the unsolicited munificence of the miser, who, on his return from the course, scrambled over the Devil's Dyke to avoid paying a turnpike.

This nobleman's funeral is reported in an article from Chester, which says—" On Tuesday evening last (August 17) the remains of the late Right Honourable Richard Earl Grosvenor, passed through this city from London, on their way to Eaton, the ancient seat of the family, where they lay in state till noon the following day, when they were conveyed in grand procession, drawn by six beautiful roan stallions (the favourite horses of his Lordship) to Eccleston Church, to be deposited with his ancestors.

" The procession, which was the most numerous and respectable we ever ever remember on such an occasion, consisted of the Mayor and Corporation of this city (of which his Lordship was the oldest member) and his particular friends, in twenty-three carriages, a long train of tenants of the family on horseback, with an immense crowd of friends and people on foot, which filled the way for a considerable distance.

"An elegant cold collation was provided for the immediate attendants, and every thing conducted suitably to the solemn occasion.—The pall was borne by John Larden, Esq. Mayor, William Leech, Esq. Bagot Reade, Esq. Thomas Ince, Esq. Edward Griffith, Esq. George Whitley, Esq. Dr. Currie, and Dr. Thackeray; the chief mourners were, Drax Grosvenor, Esq. and General Grosvenor, Member of Parliament for this city, followed by Mr. Moore, his Lordship's solicitor, and Mr. Giffard, the Corporate Body," &c. &c.

John Casson.

Lately died, at Egremont, in Cumberland, in the seventieth year of his age, Mr. John Casson, barber, one of the keenest hunters that have lived since the days of Nimrod; but all his chases were pedestrian. The hares may "blow a joyful mort" on this occasion, and proclaim a jubilee; for so fatal an enemy to their race was never known. In the season they administered to his amusement in the field, and supplied the chief comforts of his table throughout the year.—With him, shambles were a superfluous appendage to a market; and, as Boniface, in the Beaux Stratagem, says of his ale, this singular gentleman might be said to "eat his hare, to drink his hare, and to sleep upon his hare." Though it is known, that his fee for shaving never exceeded a penny, yet by an extraordinary economy, he amassed a considerable property (said to be upwards of seven thousand pounds) notwithstanding the annual expence of a game certificate: an expence, however, which, in his case, was justifiable upon the strictest principles of frugality. He continued to handle his razor, till superseded by the great shaver, Death.

In the history of this man's life, it appears that he had taken out a game certificate ever since the Act passed relative to such license:—that he always entered four game dogs—that he paid both the King's and the parochial taxes promptly and cheerfully:—and that he made, to the Commissioners of the Income Tax, a very fair and liberal return.

We have said so much to prove that the deceased was a good subject; we are now to speak of him in another capacity.

A person who has known him well, for more than forty years, says, "He was a keen sportsman, indeed; but he never injured any man, either in the pursuit of his favourite diversion, or (I believe) in any other way. He had several farms, but never advanced the rents. He lost several sums at different times: but, however fond of money the world might suppose him, there was nothing in gain powerful enough to induce him to seek legal redress in such matters."

This, we think, comprises the whole of the posthumous relations we have received of a character which is allowed, on all hands, to be a singular one.—Perhaps it will be thought more particularly so, from some of the items latterly mentioned.

We

We have now to correct a former misrepresentation. — Mr. Casson had nearly completed his eighty-sixth year; and had been a sportsman from his youth; but, it appears, that he indulged his passion for the field, merely as an amusement; for no man was more liberal of his game.—In short, though such a person might pass for an oddity, amongst his neighbours, yet it is not denied by any, that he was an inoffensive, friendly, honest man.

Death of a Pedestrian.

On the 30th of July died, at the age of ninety-six, John Sloane, bar-officer of the Sheriff's Court, acting constable and keeper of the county gaol of Kincardineshire. This man afforded so remarkable an instance of strength and activity in old age, that a short account of his life deserves to be recorded.

He was born in the neighbourhood of the town of Ayr, and had a distinct remembrance of the rebellion in 1715, and of the circumstances attending the return of his father from the battle of Sheriff-muir, in which he had been engaged as a private in the Earl of Stair's dragoons, one of the two regiments which, led on by the Duke of Argyle, routed the left wing of the rebel army. He was a farmer's servant till the year 1738, when, at the age of thirty-two, he enlisted himself in the sixth regiment of foot, then commanded by General Guise, aid-de-camp to King George II. Having, in 1740, embarked with his regiment to join the armanent under Admiral Vernor and General Wentworth, acting against the Spaniards in the West Indies and South America, he was employed in several of the unlucky expeditions in those countries, and particularly the attempt to cross the Isthmus of Darien, for the purpose of attacking Panama.

When the commanders were ordered home with the remainder of their forces, he was one of the few who were spared to return to Britain. He served in Scotland during the rebellion of 1745, and afterwards did duty ten years in Gibraltar, from which he returned to Britain about the time the unfortunate Admiral Byng was brought home a prisoner.

After being twenty-seven years a soldier, he, in 1765, received his discharge, and was admitted an out-pensioner of Clelsea Hospital. From that time, he resided constantly at Stonehaven, performing, during the last thirty-seven years of his life, the duty of an active and trusty executor of the law, in which occupation his superior manual prowess was often displayed. He was thrice married, and the last time, within these two years, to a young woman. He was a brawny man, about five feet eleven inches high, uniting a very athletic appearance to an exact symmetry of shape. Even at ninety six his gait was perfectly erect and easy. Within these last twelve months of his life, he has been known, without seeming trouble to himself, to walk from thirty to forty miles a day in the execution of his duty as a Sheriff's officer. He always enjoyed good health; and there is every reason to presume that his life might have been considerably farther prolonged, had he not, at the late county election, in a moment of hilarity, forgotten that he was old By drinking too freely he was seized with an inflammation, which, in eight days put an end to his existence.

Mr.

Mr. Angelo, Fencing Master.

THE late Mr. Angelo, who died on the 11th of July, at Eton, retained his bodily powers so well, at the advanced age of eighty-six, that he gave a lesson in fencing a few days before his death.

He was a very respectable character; his manners were elegant and courtly: he was well acquainted with life, and familiarly known to the most distinguished characters in Europe for the last half century.

He had long resided in this country, respected by persons of the highest rank, and particularly countenanced by the Royal Family. In the arts of fencing and riding he was long at the head of his profession, and by his skill in both, brought them into general adoption as necessary branches of fashionable education.

He understood all the continental tongues, and was altogether an amiable, accomplished, and estimable man.

An Excellent Markswoman,

And Singular Sporting Character.

From Hutton's Midsummer Tour.

THE ingenious Dr. W. Hutton, of Birmingham, in a late publication in which he gives an account of several singularities, which he met with in a recent journey through a part of Derbyshire, adds, but the greatest wonder I saw was, Miss Phebe Bown, in person five feet six, about thirty, well proportioned, round sized and ruddy, a dark penetrating eye which the moment it fixes upon your face, stamps your character, and that with precision. Her step, pardon the Irishism, is more manly than a man's, and can easily cover forty miles a day. Her common dress, is a man's hat, coat, and a spencer over it, and mens' shoes. I believe she is a stranger to breeches. She can lift one hundred weight with each hand, and carry fourteen score. Can sew, knit, cook, and spin, but hates them all, and every accompanyment to the female character, except that of modesty. A gentleman at the new Bath, recently treated her so rudely, "that she had a good mind to have knocked him down." She positively assured me, that she did not know what fear was—she never gives any affront, but will offer to fight any man who gives her one—if she has not fought, perhaps it is owing to the insulter being a coward, for none else would give an affront. She has strong sense, an excellent judgment, says smart things, and supports an easy freedom in all companies. Her voice is more than masculine, it its deep-toned; the wind in her favour she can send it a mile; has no beard or prominence of breast; accepts any kind of manual labour, as holding the plough, driving the team, thatching the ricks, &c. but her chief avocation is horse-breaking at a guinea a week; always rides without a saddle; is supposed the best judge of a horse, cow, &c. in the country, and is frequently requested to purchase for others at the neighbouring fairs. She is fond of Milton, Pope, Shakespeare, also of music: is self-taught, performs on several instruments, the violin, &c.

She is an excellent markswoman, and like her brother sportsmen, carries her gun upon her shoulder. She eats no beef or pork, and but little mutton, her chief food is milk, and also her drink, discarding wine, ale, and spirits.

ACCOUNT OF A MODE OF KILLING SEALS.

ON the south side of the isle of Zante, is a village named Agala. Its inhabitants, in addition to the agricultural labours which are common to them with the other islanders, avail themselves of their situation to carry on the seal-fishery. They live at the distance of only two miles from the sea, which, nevertheless, they cannot reach without descending precipices, of which the bare aspect is sufficient to inspire terror. Those mountaineers, however, having acquired intrepidity from habit, descend to the sea side with astonishing agility, only supporting themselves by a thick rope fastened to a tree, or the point of a rock.

At the water-edge, the rocks that border the sea are full of caverns, into which the seals retire to sleep, and to bring forth their young. To penetrate into these caverns, it is necessary for the adventurer to wade in the water almost chin-deep, taking care to hold aloft the pistol with which he intends to shoot his game. If the seal happens to be asleep at the time, success is certain: but, if awake, at the approach of his enemy he violently darts into the water; in which case the greatest dexterity is requisite to hit him in the head, the only place where the shot is mortal: in any other part, the wound would be but slight, and insufficient to prevent his escape.

When the mountaineer has killed the seal, he flays him in the cavern, and takes away only the skin and fat, leaving all the rest of the animal to be devoured by the birds, or carried off by the waves. The skin, being properly dressed, serves to make shoes, which are found more durable than those of neat's leather. The fat is melted and reduced to oil, which those peasants burn in their lamps, and which gives a clearer light, and lasts longer, than olive oil: but the smell which it emits while burning is intolerable to any person whose olfactory nerves are not habituated to it, as those of the inhabitants of Agala.—The spring is the most convenient season for this species of fishery.

To the EDITORS of the SPORTING MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

I AM a lover of fun; but, unluckily, although my whole life has been a jest, yet many of my pranks have been attended with the most serious consequences.

In my younger days, happening to kill a favourite cat belonging to a superannuated aunt, and the old Tabby dying soon afterwards, I lost all chance of my legacy.

I once habited myself in a white sheet, merely by way of laughing at the terrors my ghost-like appearance would excite in a nervous neighbour; but the joke was carried so far, that I was happy to get off by paying a swinging bill to the Apothecary.

A friend lending me his horse for a day, I kept it for a month, only to divert myself with his perplexity, and ran a very near chance of being tried for horse-stealing.

Thinking it would be the drollest thing on earth to set a whole family asleep, I lately administered a copious dose of laudanum to the good people, where I lodge; but, being detected, I was scundly threshed by the males, and incessantly scolded by the females.

I am the best tempered fellow alive; but am continually engaged in broils and disturbances; for I find find that though many persons enjoy the recital of a joke, nobody likes to be made the subject of one; the consequence, therefore, of my unlucky propensity is, that I have jested away all my friends and acquaintances; for whenever I speak, I am suspected of romancing; and wherever I attempt to visit, I am never admitted lest I should turn the company into ridicule; yet so deeply am I infected with the joking-mania, that it was but last night I hazarded my neck in leaping out of the one-pair-of-stairs window of a house, where I had concealed myself for the purpose of discovering if an old Miser was afraid of thieves, instead of which he pursued me with a blunderbuss.

I have run in debt for the joke's sake, and been arrested in earnest—laughed at a man with the greatest good-humour, and been knocked down with the greatest good-will.

In short, the age is a very dull age, and either does not understand, or make sufficient allowance, for the brilliant eccentricities of

RURAL SPORTS,
Not inconsistent with Clerical Life.

From the Gentleman's Magazine, for August, 1802.

MR. URBAN,

I AM concerned to perceive that there are persons watching on all occasions to exercise maliciousness against the established Clergy. The objection raised by P. P. p. 621, againg a Clergyman's partaking of Rural Sports, or publishing a work concerning them, must proceed from an illiberal and designing mind. A gentleman in orders has as much need of air, exercise, and amusement, as any other gentleman: and it is unreasonable to require, that a Clergyman should debar himself of any reputable diversion that contributes towards diminishing the vapidity of a life spent in a recluse parish.

The work intituled, "Rural Sports," is one no way incongruous either to the pen, or the library of a Clergyman; it contains much knowledge useful in the country, and is correct in the descriptions; the type is neat, and the plates well executed, and I see nothing respecting it to carp at.

ALTHARICUS.

NEGLECT OF MAIL-COACH DRIVERS.

A PERILOUS DILEMMA.

The following Letter appeared in a Morning Paper last month. It cannot be read without considerable interest; and its publication, we hope, will not fail in its effect.

Bush Inn, Bristol, Sunday noon.

I Left London last night, at eight o'clock, in the Bristol Mail, for the purpose of performing the last kind office to a near and dear relative, who has been suddenly snatched from all earthly enjoyments; and at Hounslow, our first stage, we changed horses. We arrived at the fourteen-mile stone at about half past ten o'clock, where the coachman, whose name is Wright, (and it is right that the public should know his name) together with the guard, thought proper to alight, and to leave the coach entirely to the horses, and while these men were drinking at the public house, called the Three Magpies, the horses, finding themselves at liberty, set off with incredible speed, and pursued their way to Colebrook, distant four miles. Our situation, for we were four four in number, is more easily conceived than described. For the first two or three minutes we were dumb with fear, expecting every moment to be dashed to pieces. In this dangerous state we remained for about a quarter of an hour, in which time we passed no less than three bridges, where the water is very deep, into which, if the coach had been hurled, we must have been infallibly suffocated. At the end of which time, and just before we reached the turnpike which conducts you to Colebrook, a Mr. Edwards, of Bristol, and myself, took the resolution of quitting the coach. We opened the door for this purpose twice, but the velocity of our movement terrified us; at length, however, we sprung from it, and providentially only received a few slight bruises; it was utterly impossible for us to keep our feet, owing to the impetus we received from the coach. We followed it a minute or two when it was out of sight, learning with satisfaction at the turnpike, that it had passed in safety, and soon afterwards, by means of the screams of a poor boy, whom we had taken up at Hounslow, that it was stopped at Colebrook; and here I may remark, that in our course we passed no less than six broad-wheel waggons, to one of which we approached so near as to have our lamp carried off. Let me now make a few remarks; after returning thanks to Almighty God for his merciful preservation. Travelling by the mail should call our attention to a few particulars intimately connected with our safety. We should, as much as lies in our power, prevent the coachman from calling at the public houses situated between the Post Towns, where they stop to drink, and often, with the guard, leave the horses, besides intoxicating themselves, which renders them incapable of driving. Passengers should be watchful whenever the coach stops, if the coachman alights, instantly to get out of the coach, and not to resume their places till the coachman takes his, with the reins in his hands. It would also be attentive, and answer an excellent end, if the proprietors of the mail coaches were to have painted and affixed, in some conspicuous part of the coach, that any complaints against the driver or guard would be thankfully received at their office, or the General Post-Office. This would ensure the good behaviour, and secure the lives of the passengers and the safety of the Mail; for the insolence of these fellows is insufferable: for example, when I remonstrated with Wright on account of his conduct, (for he followed us, with the guard, in a post-chaise, as soon as it could be procured, and overtook us about an hour and a half after) he replied, "that we might think ourselves d—d lucky to have escaped with our necks, and that he defied me, and every attempt, to punish him."

A few days after the publication of the above, the following paragraph appeared in some of the public papers.

"Notwithstanding Mr. Travers's exposure of the carefulness of the Bristol coachman and guard, on Friday last, in the night, a West-of-England Mail Coach was again left to itself, and the horses ran off with it; there was but one gentleman in the coach, who being asleep, was unconscious of his danger till awoke by the guard, who galloped up on horseback, and stopped the carriage. The man immediately fell on his knees to the the gentleman, intreating him not to make the circumstance public; but the names of the parties will be published as soon as the gentleman's consent is obtained."

ESSEX ASSIZES.

CHELMSFORD, AUGUST, 1802.

MALICIOUSLY SHOOTING.

ROBERT Davy was indicted for maliciously and feloniously shooting James Harrington, on the 5th of February last, by which he was dangerously wounded.

The prosecutor said he was game-keeper to Mrs. Chiswell, of Debdin Hall. He knew the prisoner well, and had caused him to be imprisoned before for snaring game on a Sunday. On the fifteenth of February last he had been to a place called Thackstead, to fetch home a pointer. It was about nine in the evening when he returned: he had some difficulty to get the dog along; it made a whining noise all the way he went. In the midway between Gossain's Farm and Tanner's Hill Farm, he received a blow on a sudden, which drove him headlong forward. He could not account for the violence; at first he was insensible; but coming to himself, he hastened to Debdin Cross to get assistance, finding himself wounded in several places. On examination, it was found he had been fired at with a gun loaded with shot, the contents of which had hit him about the neck and head; a quantity of shot was taken out of his neckcloth and under-waistcoat, and many remained buried in him to that hour. He was unable to say who had shot him; all he knew was, that the prisoner was at one Johnson's, a blacksmith, at Thackstead, when he set out to fetch the pointer. He could not be mistaken in that particular, as he had known him for five years.

Henry Wilson, a boy of thirteen years of age, nephew to Johnson, the blacksmith, had seen the prisoner at his uncle's shop, the afternoon of the same day the game-keeper was shot: he overheard a conversation that passed between the prisoner and his uncle; in which the former said he would shoot the Debdin game-keeper, and would go and buy some powder and shot for that purpose at Thomeson's. He saw him afterwards load a gun with powder and shot, and go away from his uncle's about eight o'clock at night. He did not see him till the next morning, when he came to his uncle's again, and said he had shot the Debdin keeper, and that his gun had burst in discharging it. The gun was left with his uncle to mend, James Johnson, who appeared to be an accomplice in the brutal act, was next examined. He said the prisoner had come to his house at ten o'clock on the night Mr. Harrington was wounded, and had told him he had shot the Debdin keeper. Witness exclaimed, "I hope not." He replied, "He actually had." Witness then said, "What do you think will become of you? you will certainly be hanged!" Prisoner rejoined, "That is no matter of your's—I want more shot and powder." Witness said, he had none, and he went away. The next morning he came again, and brought a gun; he knew not whether it was burst; he believed it might. He had since worked it out.

[Here the witness equivocated in so shameful a way, and behaved in so disgraceful a manner, that Baron

Baron Macdonald informed him, if he continued prevaricating and fencing with the questions put to him, he would have him indicted as a principal, and, if found guilty, hanged within twenty-four hours.]

The witness continued, and confessed that Davy was at his house previous to the keeper being shot at, but denied that any conversation like that which had been detailed by his nephew had taken place; on the contrary, all he had sworn to (he said) was false.

James Sutcliffe was at Thackstead the same evening that Harrington was shot at. On his return between nine and ten, he met the prisoner, and mistaking him for his brother, exclaimed, "Aye! Jemmy! is it you?" The prisoner said, "You are mistaken." Witness replied, "Well, I may be, but I am within one of it." The prisoner had something black in his hand, which looked like a walking-stick. He afterwards recollected that it was Robert Davy, and not James, he had spoken to. He saw him the next morning, with a gun on his arm, which appeared to be burst.

Mrs. Tolley lived a short way from Gossain's Farm; and saw a man run by her on the night the game-keeper was shot. She believed that man was the prisoner.

Mrs. Bass lived a small distance from the spot where Mr. Harrington was shot. She heard a noise as the clock was striking nine; it was the howl of a dog, and being somewhat alarmed, she looked out of the door. While there, she saw a man, dressed in a smock-frock, leaning over a gate, looking towards the road. In a minute or so, he dashed over a style, ran a few paces towards Gossain's Farm, and she heard the report of a gun. In a few minutes after, she found Mr. Harrington had been shot at and wounded.

Mrs. Francis, who lived upon the same spot, gave precisely the same evidence.

The prisoner, in his defence, denied any knowledge of the crime laid to his charge, and protested his innocence.

Baron Macdonald observed, that the crime of wilfully and maliciously shooting had very properly been made a capital offence; as in such cases God alone could interfere to prevent death—the intent was the same. Whoever had shot in the case before them, the wilful intent was manifest from the effects produced, and the Jury were called upon to say, if the prisoner was the guilty person. The principal evidence to lead their judgments was that of an infant; and he had ever found that such evidence was either the very best or worst; of that they would have to decide; and if they found the lad's demeanour and manner of conducting himself the reverse of Johnson's, he thought he was entitled to credit, as a more shameful witness never stood up in a box. The rest of the evidence he would also read to them, and, when he had done so, it would be for them to say, whether or not the charge was brought home to the prisoner. His Lordship recapitulated the evidence; and the Jury, after a long consultation, pronounced the prisoner—Not Guilty; observing, that they did not think he had been identified sufficiently to induce them with safety to find any other verdict.

The Judge observed, that he had that day been tried twice for his life, and each time had been acquitted for want of evidence. He would advise him to take care for the future, convinced as he was,

was, that he was one of the worst fellows that ever infested the county of Essex.

Johnson, the accomplice, was then tried for a single felony, found guilty, and sentenced to be transported for seven years.

This fellow's attempt to make the Court believe his nephew had perjured himself, cannot be equalled in the annals of human depravity.

Nothing could be more artless than the boy's tale, or bear the semblance in a greater degree of honesty and truth.

The Court were, one and all, disgusted, not to say incensed, at this miscreant's conduct.

Sporting Liberty.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

Gentlemen,

I Remember well, in my school-days, or in other words, during the zenith of the late Mr. Wilkes's political celebrity, that the vox populi was one incessant bawl of "Liberty, Property, and No Excise;"—"Better Times to us!"—was the salutation of every industrious man to his friend over his evening pint; and "Pitt for ever," was the exclamation of gratitude to the man who "had deserved so well of his country." Now, Gentlemen, those who know me best, best know I am no croaker; but, as I have been, more than forty years watching, personally and experimentally, the progress of Liberty, and drinking "Better times," as well as my neighbours, I must beg your permission to communicate to my brother sportsmen how wonderfully we have succeeded in the attainment of our wishes, in respect to the liberty of which our forefathers were so vociferously ambitious, as well as how much better the times are now in the present new æra of Peace and Plenty, to what they were at the time before alluded to, when even poor old Dunstall, at Covent-Garden Theatre, in the part of Quidnunc, in the Upholsterer, used to exclaim, "then how are we ruined?"

At this period, Gentlemen, I was little more than a juvenile, enjoying the smiles and favours of most of the chaste damsels, with which the first and second floors of nearly all the houses in Bow-street, Charles-street, Russell-street, and Bridges-street, were then so plentifully furnished. The jelly-houses, Marjoram's, Weatherby's, Rowland's, Jupp's, and Bob Derry's, constituted a blaze of nocturnal brilliancy; but, as Jerry Sneak says, "all those happy days are gone and past." I could then go into either of the three latter, and have my mutton-chop, pickle, (or potatoe) a slice of fruit pie, bread, cheese, pint of porter, a glass of brandy and water, give the waiter two-pence for himself, and march out, (with a low bow into the bargain) for fifteen pence, a Gentleman of no small respectability; what it can be done for now, some of your city chop-house friends may, probably, tell much better than me, as it is entirely out of my beat; but I know enough to find we have been drinking better times to very little purpose.

The Bishops, perhaps, to ameliorate our condition, would tell us "the prayers of the wicked never prevail." It may be so. We are told by the diurnal prints, that many members of the legislature have said, "the constitution is impaired, paired, the liberty of the subject taken away, and that we are hastening to a national bankruptcy, and inevitable ruin."

Upon these remarks, in the aggregate, I do not feel myself adequate to give a decisive opinion; but in respect to the liberty of the subject, I do presume to aver, we are not a single whit worse than we were, so far as the idea of free agency (alias liberty) is concerned. For instance, I drank for years, good old port, at the first taverns in London, and principal inns in the country, for two shillings a bottle, and surely I have the liberty to do so now if I pay four.

I formerly laid a gun across my arm, and very frequently took a stroll, more for the sake of my health, and by way of amusement or relaxation, than any certainty of killing even a sparrow; and surely I have the liberty of doing so now for the very trifling consideration of three guineas towards the support of the infinite increase of placemen and pensioners, which the increase of liberty and property, as well as the increase of the national debt, have rendered so essentially necessary.

I had then the unrestrained convenience of keeping a horse ('tis true) with all possible economy, as an object indispensably necessary to the professional support of my infant family; which liberty, it is equally true, I am not deprived of now; but the polite and friendly collector of taxes urges the compulsive necessity of paying him two pounds annually towards the exigences of the state.

My poor grateful inoffensive canine friends too, who were my constant companions in all weathers, and in all vicissitudes, I was wont to support as dependents and protectors, whose every look was a genuine master stroke of the most sincere and unsullied affection. These, it is true, I had the privilege to kill, or the liberty to keep, upon paying the legislative tribute; from which it seems the late "just and necessary war" has left very little free. It is to be presumed, when Shakespeare wrote his play of Cymbeline, and put into the mouth of Cloten the following passage—"If Cæsar can hide the sun from us with a blanket, or put the moon in his pocket, we will pay him a tribute for light." He certainly could not intentionally have sported a prophetic prediction of the present increased window tax, which all must as good and loyal subjects pay, but the rich only can approve. In this my hitherto boasted liberty completely leaves me; it is but two years since I entered into a lease for a house (which had stood some time empty) having nineteen windows, and at that number was assessed: however, Mr. Assessor, the window-peeper, finding two small panes not eight inches square, in a small back door, and calling into his aid a very diminutive fanlight in front, makes the number twenty-one, at no less a taxation than the sum of ten pounds fifteen shillings annually, for an individual in a small habitation; whether this is not "out-heroding Herod," I do not presume to say, lest I should be directly accused of jacobinism, or branded with the name of traitor, appellations I despise.

However, as "there is no rule without an exception," so the exception happens here; I possess no liberty to leave my house, or to block up my windows, unless the family can live without the light, which neither Cymbeline, or his son, Cloten, would condescend to to pay for. It is, however, some consolation, that any or every man when overpowered with rates and taxes beyond his power to contribute; when at the last moment he sees his gradual approach to the confines of a prison, he has still the liberty by committing an act of suicide, to get rid of all his misery, and leave the world to those who have more reason to be pleased with it than himself; in full and uninterrupted possession of which privilege, who, but a croaker, a jacobin, and traitor, shall presume to say, the constitution is impaired, or the liberty of the subject in any degree taken away. SAFEGUARD SPLINTER BARS;

Or an account of the new method of disengaging Horses from Carriages, for which a Patent has lately been granted to Mr. John Williams, of Portsmouth.

MR. Williams's invention consists chiefly in the addition of a rolling splinter-bar, affixed to the usual or main splinter-bar, in such a way as will suffer it to turn on its axis, when needful, and also in the means of fastening the traces to the said rolling-bar.

The method of disengaging the horses is very simple: a person in the carriage has need only, by means of a cord, to pull back a bolt, when a lever immediately rises, in consequence of the action on the traces, the studs by which the traces are fastened to the rolling splinter-bar change their position, and the traces are instantly set at liberty. The patentee extends his invention to all kinds of carriages. Those that have shafts are to have a socket fixed to the end of each; and those which have shafts, or a pole, which from its construction would fall to the ground as soon as the horse, or horses, are disengaged, are to have a piece of iron, with a broad bottom, or a wheel, affixed to each shaft, or the pole, to prevent the motion being checked too suddenly by the fall.

Mr. Williams does not claim the method of disengaging the harness from the ends of the pole or shafts, as part of his invention. He observes, that the operation of disengaging the horse, or horses, is performed with as much facility as the pulling of a check-string; and, notwithstanding the simplicity of the process, it will be found that the horses are as securely attached to the carriage as upon the common construction.

The exclusive right of manufacturing these safeguard splinter-bars has been assigned to Andrew Leith and Co. of Shoe-lane, Fleet-street.

A NEW PATENT STIRRUP.

THIS invention is intended by Mr. Maltby, of Nottingham, to preserve the rider, &c. &c.

The bottom of Mr. Maltby's stirrup is made larger than the lower surface of the foot, and may be plain, or in bars, according to the fancy of the workman. From the middle of the sides a hoop springs, very much like the hoop of the common stirrup; then at small distances from each other, all round the front part of the stirrup, bended bars are fastened, and being carried up, unite in the center-hoop, and thus make a sort of basket-work for the front part of the foot; the bars are placed too close to admit the boot or shoe, and therefore the possibility of entangling the foot is effectually prevented, should the rider be thrown from his horse; and the whole whole is so contrived, by adapting the stirrup to the particular person for whom it is made, that the instep and ankle can never be injured by friction. The whole may be made of iron, or any other metal fit for the purpose.

Observation.—We have not seen one of these stirrups executed; but, from the drawing which accompanies the specification, it should appear not an ornament; if, however, security is attained, the public will doubtless consider the invention as worthy of being adopted.

Particulars of the Influence of Rattlesnakes upon Birds.

DR. Barton, a physician of great eminence in America, has proved, by a variety of facts, that the motions of birds, which have been attributed to a facinating power in the eyes of serpents, are in reality calculated to drive away the reptiles from the bird's young, or to divert their attention from the nest.

He observes that the rattlesnake does not climb up trees, but the black snake, and some other species of the genus colaber, do. When impelled by hunger, and incapable of satisfying it by the capture of animals on the ground, they begin to glide up trees or bushes, upon which a bird has its nest. The bird is not ignorant of the serpent's object. She leaves her nest, whether it contains eggs or young ones, and endeavours to oppose the reptile's progress. In doing this, she is actuated by the strength of her instinctive attachment to her eggs, or of affection to her young. Her cry is melancholy, her motions are tremulous. She exposes herself to the most eminent danger. Sometimes she approaches so near the reptile, that he seizes her as his prey. But this is far from being universally the case. Often she compels the serpent to leave the tree, and then returns to her nest. It is commonly believed that the rattlesnake is a very hardy animal; but this is not the case. A very small stroke on any part of its body disables it from running at all; and the slightest stroke upon the top of the head is followed by instant death. The skull-bone is remarkably thin and brittle; so much so, that it is thought a stroke from the wing of a thrush or robbin would be sufficient to break it, and indeed some of the smaller birds of prey feed on it.

A Description of an Elephant-hunt in Ceylon.

THE singularity of the process by which these powerful beasts are caught and domesticated, renders it one of the most interesting and surprising spectacles in the world.

Three or four thousand villagers are employed under the direction of about as many hundred huntsmen, for two or three months, encircling a large tract of country, at one end of which is built a large and strong wooden kraal, or nearly circular palisade, of about a quarter of a mile in circumference. The hunters continue gradually reducing their circle, and frightening, by fires, and shouts, the elephants which are within it towards the kraal, through the gates of which they are at last oblige to enter; and immediately they are in, a portcullis drops, and incloses them. There is another gate, with a portcullis, which leads into a still stronger stockade, about twenty feet wide, and that leads into a third, which is still stronger, but so narrow, that one elephant only can pass at a time. When a sufficient number of elephants are driven from the first kraal, into the second, the portcullis is then let down, by a man who is stationed at the top of the place where they enter for that purpose.

The beasts being cruelly squeezed by their numbers and size, endeavour to make their escape, and run into the third kraal.

As soon as an elephant has fairly entered this third kraal, cross beams are inserted, between the upright poles, which effectually prevent his return. As he advances, the same process is continued, till he arrives at the very end, where he is jammed so closely as not to be able to move backwards or forwards. Strong ropes, with running knots, are fastened round his legs and neck, and these last are drawn through ropes fastened on the necks of two tame elephants, accustomed to the business, who are brought to the end of the kraal, where the prisoner is confined. The poles, which form the door of it, are then removed, and the ropes which fasten the neck of the wild elephant to those of the tame ones, are lightened, till he is made secure between his new companions. The ropes are then taken from his legs, and his two conductors oblige him, by squeezing him with their bodies, and beating him with their trunks, if refractory, to accompany them to the place set apart for his stable. He is tied so fast, with his head between two poles fixed in the ground, that he cannot move, and from the peculiar docility of his nature, soon assumes sufficient mansuetude to become useful for the purpose of man.

Tiger Hunt in the East Indies.

While a detachment of the first battalion of the fifteenth regiment lay encamped at a village near Polleveran Hills, in the Carnatic, on the night of the 28th December, a royal tiger came into the village, and seized a bullock; after gorging on his prey, he retired to a house on the banks of the river, where he took up his quarters.

Lieutenant Stuart being informed of it, went at day-light, with a Naik's guard, to the place, where they saw the monster stretched in the cottage. They mounted on the roof of the adjoining hut, and, by removing the thatch of that wherein he lay, disturbed him, and he went out. After a few turns, he sprang at the party, and settled on the roof close to them, but an instantaneous discharge of two or three fire-locks wounded him, and he fell to the ground, but immediately got up and made a second attempt, when finding his efforts ineffectual, he made off under a pandal adjoining the house he first entered, and could not for some time be found.

The bank of the river was very abrupt at this place, about twenty feet perpendicular. On the edges grew small bushes and long grass; a narrow path led along it that would admit but one person at a time. Mr. Stuart took this road, and as he examined the bushes, the savage sprung at him from his concealment; he received him on his bayonet, which entered the tiger's breast, but the shock was so strong as to throw the gentleman backward over the precipice, but fortunately without injury, and the tiger was too much hurt to follow. Mr. Stuart soon recovered, and and returned with the Sepoys to the attack, when the beast was killed.

Wolf-hunting in France, in 1608,

By Lord Herbert, of Cherbourg.

"AND now," says his Lordship, "as every morning I mounted the great horse, so in the afternoon I many times went a hunting, the manner of which was this:—The Duke of Montmorenci, having given orders to the tenants of the town of Merlou and some villages adjoining to attend me when I went a hunting, they, upon my summons, usually repaired to those woods, where I intended to find my game, with drums and musquets, to the number of sixty or eighty, and sometimes one hundred, or more persons, they entering the wood on that side with that noise, discharging their pieces and beating their said drums; we on the other side of the said wood having placed mastiffs and greyhounds, to the number of twenty or thirty, which Monsieur de Montmorenci kept near his castle, expected those beasts they should force out of the woods; if stags, or wild boars came forth, we commonly spared them, pursuing only the wolves, which were then in great number, of which there are found two sorts; the mastiff-wolf, thick and short, though he could not indeed run fast, yet would fight with our dogs; the greyhound wolf, long and swift, who many times escaped our best dogs, though, when he were overtaken, easily killed by us without making much resistance; of both these sorts I killed divers with my sword, while I stayed there."

Election Slang at a Cock-and-Hen Club.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

The suggestion to send you this transcript, arose from reading the eccentric account of Brentford Races, in page 279 of your last number. In the following, the pleasantry of the Wit, and not the pungency, or the propriety of the satire, is the most admirable; it seemed necessary to throw it into the form of a Letter to Sir Francis Burdett, from which the following is an extract.

Your's, &c.

To Sir Francis Burdett, Bt.

SIR,

AS it is but once in seven years that we poor devils dare approach you, I shall not make any apology, but proceed to unfold to you the cause of giving you this trouble. You must know, Sir, that I, and a number of your well-wishers, to the amount of more than one hundred, met at St. Giles's, in order to celebrate your triumph at Brentford. Well, Sir, we were all assembled and determined to make a joyous night of it; our table would have done your heart good to see; it was not as you have yours, decorated with nick-nacks, but it was clean and wholesome, plenty of bread, cheese, and onions, clean scowered pewter plates filled with tobacco, and a profusion of porter and gin. When we had all done eating, and the men and some of the women had filled their pipes, the chairman demanded silence, and gave, as his first toast, "Our Worthy Member for the county of Middlesex, Sir Francis Burdett;" I need not tell you with what joy it was received; round it went with three times three; but when one of the members happened unfortunately to mention the Bastile, you cannot conceive conceive what a damp it shed over us; but, however, another bumper to "The Man of the People," brought us about, and we began to be as cheerful as ever; when a few unguarded words from our chairman, threw us all into confusion.—Our chairman, Sir, happened to say, (God bless his heart, I dare say he thought no more harm than the child unborn) "There was no fear but that Sir Francis would soon put down the Bastile, not altogether on our account, but because it had been the place of confinement not only for such as us, but for those who were suspected of treasonable practices;" when the chairwoman (for you must know, Sir Francis, we have a chairwoman to keep the ladies in order) flew from her seat; by the bye, she is a very large woman, and sells fish; and, as I was saying, she flew round the room, and gave the chairman a smack in the jaws. "What," says she, "do you offer, for to go, for to say, as how, Sir Francis is guilty of reasonable practices, poor soul:" her passion was so great, she did not know what she said; she meant treasonable, but on she went: "No," says she, "I defy any one to say that Sir Francis Burdett was ever guilty of a reasonable practice in his life; and bl—t her (for she is apt to swear when in passion) if she believed he ever would."

Well, Sir, our chairman used all the soothing arguments he was master of, but would not attempt to set her right, as to the mistake she had made in the word, for fear it might irritate her; but gave her his honour, that he never suspected you of any reasonable practices; all that he meant was, he feared that in the wicked age we live in, there might be people infamous enough to call your actions reasonable. Well, when she found he did not mean to charge you with any thing that is reasonable, she began to be a little so herself; resumed her seat, filled her pipe, and ordered a bumper to be filled to the downfall of the Bastile, and its Governor; so harmony being restored, we became as merry as grigs, sung many flash songs, and gave some very loyal toasts: the King, the Queen, and all the Royal Family.

But after all our jollity, we had like to have had another rumption; one of the company happened to say, he had been at several elections, and had heard gentlemen vilify each other; but what he had heard at Brentford, out-did all he had ever heard, and that the palm of scurrility must be voted to Sir Francis Burdett; upon which, up again gets our chairwoman: "I tell you what, Mr. Bob Booty," says she, "if I hears any more of your sinuations about civility, d—n me if I don't throw one of the pots at your head; Sir Francis, I am sure, has not half so much civility about him, as a great many other gentlemen has; therefore, none of your sinuations about his civility." "Why, you foolish woman," says he, "I meant no harm; I was only glorying that such a g[illegible] man as Sir Francis could condescend to use such language as we are apt to do when we fall out." "Well," says she, "to be sure he must be of a very descending spirit; and if that was all you meant, why there was no harm; but d—n me, if I would not knock any one's eye out, that should dare to sinuate any thing against him: where will you find another gentleman to come forward in our behalf as he has done; have you ever read his address to the freeholders; there is language for you, if if you talk of language; what wonderful expressions does he make use of; does he not promise to give himself and his life for our sakes; and I dare say, would give his soul too, if he has one." "Hush!" says the chairman, "you, I am sure, do not mean to say, that Sir Francis has no soul." "As for that matter," says she, "I have often soles that I would willingly get rid of." Then we had a loud laugh, for we thought it a stroke of wit; for you know, Sir, I told you she is a dealer in fish. "Well," says our chairman, "let us drop all disputes, and be jolly." But she had got upon her high ropes about your letter, and on she went. "Does he not say that he is so gusted with the wickedness of the age, that he intended to withdraw himself from society, poor dear gentleman! perhaps would have gone to some solitary cell, and pined himself to death, for the good of his country; but that he was invited by the most polite and most enlightened county to represent them?" But she was stopped in the midst of her harangue, by one of the company saying, "I dare say Sir Francis wrote that invitation to himself." "Well, Mr. Flabbe-jaws," says she, "and suppose he did, is not every thing fair at Elections; what is it to us so long as we have got him, by what means it was done." You will, perhaps, be a little surprised at some few expressions you will meet with in this, but I assure you, Sir Francis, we have several well-informed men amongst us; and if your plan should take place, I dare say we shall have a great many more; therefore, my dear Sir Francis, do attend to this request of ours; give your orders for demolishing the bastile, and when they are about it, let them pull down that other big house in Clerkenwell-Green, and drive the old villain from his other seat, then neither we nor you will have any thing to fear; for though you so courageously told us at Brentford, that neither King, Lords, nor Commons, should intimidate you, yet while such hideous places are left standing, there is no knowing what might happen. As to our Judges (for they are as bad as the Chairman of the Sessions), when you take your seat in the house, cannot you give your orders that there shall be no more? Of what use are they? A parcel of old fellows, with their great wigs, frightening poor fellows to death, if any of us are brought before them for any little frolic; such as knocking out a man's brains, and taking away what you know he could have no occasion for after. "Oh! hang him! hang him! by all means hang him!" Pretty proceedings in a free country, an't they? however, we hope now all such will be put a stop to. Now, Sir, as you have got to represent the most polite and best-informed county in England, you'll tell them what is what; and so wishing you all the success I think you deserve, I remain your most devoted, most obliged, and most humble servant,

A FREEBOOTER
Of the County of Middlesex.

St. Giles's.

P. S. As several of the company are beginning to throw off, and to be terrible noisy, I think it proper to make a motion for another supper at the other end of the town, somewhere about Saltpetre Bank; and as we are getting on so fast, if there should be a rumption, I fear some would be at a loss for queer bail at this time o'night,

To

To the EDITORS of the SPORTING MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

YOU will naturally conceive with how much regret and mortification I take up the pen to inform you of the greatest misfortune that could possibly have happened to me in this life. I may justly, and most feelingly exclaim,

"Othello's occupation's gone!"

You, Gentlemen, who of course keep your hunters, and enjoy the chase with an extacy beyond description, will sympathise with me in the recital.

At the very moment that my horse "was out of physic," sleek as a mole, coat like satin, not a speck, splent, spavin, curb, or wind-gall, when a new saddle, bridle, and breast-plate, from Gibson, two new pair of Cordovan boots, from Hoby, the same number of leathern conveniences, from Foster, and a black velvet dasher, from the cap-maker, were lying before me, and nothing wanting but a week's patience and a gentle rain to take the field, the dreadful news reached me, that the Putney Pack, availing themselves of the Peace, and the rage for travelling are, to the inexpressible disappointment of me and my brother sportsmen, transferred, and transported to the Continent. Death could scarcely have been a more severe and distressing stroke; the despondency of Old Square-Toes, at the repeated falls of stock, did not affect me half so much as this misfortune. I am now compelled to bid a reluctant adieu to the exhilarating chops of partial trail we enjoyed amongst the fern, upon the sides of the bogs and swampy bottoms of Putney Heath, where, in many a cold and cutting day in winter, we have had most glorious sport, without the trouble of riding a mile from the spot.

It is not without the most heart-felt misery I must now relinquish every hope and expectation of renewing the scenes of former happiness; no more bursts of half a mile, and killing in view, or losing in a bog; no more racing gallops, up one hill and round another; no more emulative competition for speed over the country, from Abershaw's Gibbet to Lord Spencer's Park, a distance very little less than three-quarters of a mile; no more drawing Coomb Woods for three or four hours to find a Fox, without being able to run him five minutes; in short, Gentlemen, as Jerry Sneak says, "all those happy days are gone and past." In this predicament, replete with agitation, no chance of riding home seven or eight miles in the dirt, as if I was racing for a thousand; no opportunity to bore sisters, aunts, or cousins, with the dangers of the day; in fact, without a most distant hope of sporting regeneration, I must entreat you will communicate information to the Sporting World, that the Putney district is now vacant.—The hares seldom go far from home, and foxes may always be found at earth in Coomb Woods.

If a Subscription Pack can be formed, I have no objection to subscribe Five Guineas, provided the money is paid quarterly; or who knows, but when so fine a country is open, we may have a Pack from the North, and keep them in the City, or near Black-Friars' Bridge, by subscription.

Your's most truly,

TIMMY FIDKIN.

RURAL

RURAL SPORTS AT MARGATE, SEPT. 14.

PREPARATIONS commenced at an early hour yesterday morning, for those sports which the following advertisement will explain:

"The Sports on the Sands, will take place this afternoon at four o'clock, and will commence with a

JINGLING MATCH FOR A SILVER WATCH,

To continue for half an hour. Candidates for this prize must provide themselves with a cap and a handkerchief, otherwise they cannot be admitted.

THE ASS RACE.

Between five or more Asses, will take place at the conclusion of the Jingling Match, and they are to start from Mr. Hubbard's Bathing Block, go round the Rock, and return by the Bathing Room to the Starting Post, and the same ground to be repeated, which is to determine the first heat.

After the first heat, a Race will take place between several

YOUNG WOMEN FOR A SHIFT,

And when concluded, the second heat of the Asses will commence; and should the winner of this heat be the same as won the first heat, he will have the prize of one pound eleven shillings and six-pence; if otherwise, the whole of the prizes to be determined by a third heat.

If five Asses start, the prizes will be as follows:

For the first Ass that comes in, one pound eleven shillings and six-pence.

For the second ditto, one pound one shilling.

If seven Asses start, there will be a prize of ten shillings and six-pence for the third. The Subscriptions are only adequate to defray the expence of the above sports, and therefore the rest must be abandoned, unless the visitors at Margate come forward with their subscriptions this forenoon; and if that should be the case, there will be a match between

MEN JUMPING IN SACKS,

RACE FOR A SHIRT,

Besides other Sports.

The Asses entered for the Race are as follows, and the Riders will be distinguished by coloured ribbons, Jack Fox's famous Ass, Eclipse —Pink.

Joe Small's Ditto, Pot8o's—Red.

Jemmy Jones's Ditto, Teddy—blue.

Timothy Flanagan's ditto, Pic Nic—Green.

Pat Doyle's Ditto, Luny Mactwolter—Yellow."

By three o'clock the Pier, the Cliff, the balconies of the several bathing-houses, and in fact every spot from which those singular amusements could be viewed, were crowded with spectators. Apparently not less than ten thousand persons were present. The fashionables were all in their chariots on the Sands.

About half after four o'clock the Asses arrived at the starting post, after having gone in procession through the principal streets in the town, preceded by a band of music, the Union Flag, and a long pole, upon which was hoisted the shift, decorated with various ribbons, which was to be the prize of the delicate fair one who should succeed in the race.

The entertainments commenced with the Ass-race. Bets ran high at starting, six to four "Teddy against the Sands" (why not as fair a figure as "Diamond against the the field?"). Many of the knowing ones seemed to incline to Eclipse. Colonel Greville, the British Mæcenas, hazarded much upon Pic Nic, but his favourite ran restive before he had gone far from the starting post. Teddy grew sulky before he had finished the first round, and neither intreaties nor blows could persuade him (to use his rider's phrase) "to stir a peg." The contest chiefly lay between Pot8o's, Eclipse, and Luney Mactwolter. Pot8o's, however, after having been hard pushed by Eclipse, won by a neck, and was received with shouts of acclamations.

The Jingling Match next succeeded, which was productive of infinite merriment, as the scene was new to the cocknies. After a variety of tumbling by the blindfolded, the Jingler, who during the contest, had relieved himself from the incumbrance of all his wardrobe, except smallclothes and stockings, carried the prize. The conquering hero was immediately lifted on the shoulders of his friends and borne about in triumph.

The second heat of the Ass Race then followed, and Pot8o's again victorious, obtained his reward.

The race for the Shift and the Jumping in Sacks, excited little interest, as the superior dexterity of a gipsey swain and his lovely nymph, set all competition at nought.

The whole concluded about half past seven o'clock, and never have I witnessed a scene which possessed more the genuine character of fun. Every one appeared to enjoy it; but unfortunately the pleasure of the evening was somewhat alloyed by a riot, commenced by the Captain of one of the Margate Hoys, and some of the Quay porters. There were some black eyes, bloody noses, torn clothes, and other marks of glory; but no serious consequences ensued: each party retired, apparently satisfied with the injury done the other.

The Ball last night at Benson's rooms, was very thinly attended. The Balls of Monday night have not been much countenanced this season, though the Master of the Ceremonies has used his utmost exertions to collect company; and though the Proprietors of the Theatre have, as a matter of accommodation, for several weeks back, consented to close the Theatre on that evening. Indeed those Proprietors continue to make every possible overture, and every concession required, to conciliate the Conductors of the other places of entertainment here, without producing the harmony so desirable to the pleasures of the public.

Extraordinary Duel.

THE following account of a Duel lately fought in America, is extracted from a New-York Paper; and we think a stronger instance of minute diplomatic skill in the arrangements made by the Seconds, or of persevering hostility on the part of the Principals, never occurred.—After several Letters had passed between the Principals, Messrs. Swartout and Clinton, the Seconds negotiated the following Preliminaries:

Arrangement.

1. To leave this Island from different points in two boats, precisely at five o'clock, on Saturday, P. M. and to proceed to the place proposed.—The party first arriving, will wait the landing of the other. Each boat shall be rowed by four confidential persons only, who shall remain in their respective boats until called for. These persons are

are not to be armed in any manner whatever. There will be but seven persons in each boat, viz.—The Principal, his Second, one Surgeon, and four Oarsmen.—The Surgeons may attend in silence on the ground.

2. The distance between the parties to be ten yards measured by the Seconds—and the positions shall be distinctly marked.

3. The Seconds shall determine, by lots, the choice of position.

4. The pistols are not to exceed eleven inches in the barrel; they are to be smooth bores, and to be loaded by the Seconds, in each others presence, shewing a smooth ball.

5. The Gentlemen will stand with their backs to each other at their respective stations, and in this position shall each receive a pistol, and the Seconds having determined, by lot, who gives the word. He to whom the lot falls shall take his position in the centre, retired from the line of fire, and shall distinctly say, "attention, Gentleman, to the right face," upon which they shall face to the right and fire, with promptitude; if one fires before the other, the opposite Second shall say, one, two, three, fire, and he shall fire.

6. The left hand shall not be brought in support of the right arm; nor be placed on the right breast or side.

7. If either should be wounded before he has fired, and means to fire, he shall, if he can stand unsupported, be entitled to his shot, and not otherwise. If either has fired, is wounded, and means to proceed, he shall receive no assistance; his Second will only exchange the pistol. If he falls forward the Seconds will repost him.

8. At the exchange of pistols, correct positions are to be resumed, and the words given as in article five.

9. A snap or flash to be considered a fire.—The pistol must not be recovered.

10. Neither party to quit his station without order, or the consent of the two Seconds.

(Signed) S. Riker.
W. S. Smith.

New York, July 30, 1802.

Agreeably to the preceding preliminaries, the respective Gentlemen attended as agreed upon, left the city at five o'clock, and passed to the point proposed, arriving as nearly together as the current would admit, the one obliquely ascending, and the other descending the stream.

The ground being correctly measured, and intermediate questions adjusted, the Gentlemen took their stations, were each presented with a pistol, and by order, faced to the right, and fired, ineffectually. At the request of Mr. Riker, I asked Mr. Swartout, "are you satisfied, Sir?" He answered, "I am not." The pistols then being exchanged, and their positions resumed, by order, the Gentlemen faced to the right, and fired a second shot, without effect. At the request of Mr. Riker, I again addressed Mr. Swartout, "are you satisfied, Sir?" He answered strongly in the negative; we proceeded, and a third shot was exchanged without injury. At the request of Mr. Riker, I again asked Mr. Swartout, "are you satisfied, Sir?" He answered, "I am not, neither shall I be until the apology is made which I have demanded—until then, we must proceed." I then presented a paper to Mr. Riker, containing the apology demanded, for Mr. Clinton's signature, observing, that we could not spend our time in conversation, that that this paper must be signed, or proceed. Mr. Clinton declared he would not sign any paper on the subject—he had no animosity against Mr. Swartout; would willingly shake hands—and agree to meet hereafter on the score of former friendships. Mr. Swartout insisting on his signature to the apology, and Mr. Clinton declining, they stood at their post, and fired a fourth shot. Mr. Clinton's ball struck Mr. Swartout's left leg, about six inches below the knee—he stood steady and collected. At the request of Mr. Riker, I again addressed Mr. Swartout, "are you satisfied, Sir?" He answered, that "it was useless to repeat the question—my determination is fixed—and I beg we may proceed."

Mr. Clinton repeated that he had no animosity against Mr. Swartout—was sorry for what had passed—proposed to advance, shake hands, and bury the circumstance in oblivion. During this conversation, Mr. Swartout's surgeon kneeling by his side, extracted the ball from the opposite side of the leg; Mr. Swartout standing erect on his post; and positively declining any thing short of an ample apology, they fired a fifth shot, and Mr. Swartout received the ball in the left leg, about five inches above the ancle; still, however, standing steady on his post, perfectly composed. At the request of Mr. Riker, I again addressed Mr. Swartout, "are you satisfied, Sir?" He forcibly answered, "I am not, Sir, proceed." Mr. Clinton then quitting his station, declined the combat, and declared he would fire no more. Mr. Swartout expressed himself surprised, that Mr. Clinton would neither apologize, nor give him the satisfaction required, and addressing me said, "What shall I do, my friend?" I answered, "Mr. Clinton declines making the apology required—refuses taking his position—and positively declares he will fire no more—and his Second appearing to acquiesce in the disposition of his Principal, there is nothing further left for you, now, but to have your wounds dressed." The surgeons attended, dressed Mr. Swartout's wounds, and the Gentlemen in their respective barges returned to the City.

Shooting in Scotland without Liberty.

TWO gentlemen, said to be of the army, came from the south to Lockerbie on the 11th instant, and next day, without liberty given, went to the moors near that place, and killed several brace of grouse. On the 13th they set out again, when information having come from various quarters, the deputy clerk of the peace presented a petition for one of the proprietors of the grounds, to a neighbouring justice of the peace, who granted a warrant to apprehend the persons of the two strangers, and to incarcerate them (upon the facts being admitted or proved) until they should find bail to compear in an action to be brought against them for trespass, damages, and penalties, in terms of the laws.

They were so detained in custody for several hours, when the petitioners procurator and the justice having mitigated the claim to five pounds each, besides expences, in respect of the strangers seeming ignorance of the laws, not on account of their rank, which they erroneously appeared to think might give them a claim to tolerance; and on payment of the money they departed.

They

They were assured, and shewn, contrary perhaps to their expectations, that the laws of that part of the United Kingdom made no distinction of persons, when trespass of property was committed, without liberty given. The money recovered was distributed among the poor of the parishes of Dryfesdale, Sibbaldbie, and Hutton, where the trespass was committed.

TRAVELS IN UPPER AND LOWER EGYPT,
During the CAMPAIGNS of GENERAL BONAPARTE,
By VIVANT DENON:
Translated from the French.
To which is prefixed, an Historical Account of the INVASION of EGYPT by the FRENCH.
By E. A. KENDAL, Esq.
Illustrated with Maps, Views, &c. &c.
In Two Volumes Octavo.
Printed by J. Cundee, Ivy-lane, for B. Crosby and Co. Stationer's-court, Paternoster-Row. 1802.

This is a work, which after all that has been written and said of Egypt, may still be explored as an inexhaustible store-house, of valuable and curious information.

"Travellers," says the Translator, "have always intermingled adventure with observation, and their readers have been pleased to find description relieved by action; but few have had opportunities of animating their works with adventure, like those in which M. Denon was engaged. He is truly an elegant writer, an accurate and picturesque observer, and a lively historian, employed upon a mass of information, which nothing but his own talents and situation could have procured. The division commanded by General Dessaix, M. Denon followed to the cataracts, partaking its fatigues and dangers; and at Thebes he had the good fortune to find manuscripts in the antique character of the Egyptians, and which (if decyphered) may be reckoned an epoch in ancient learning, that may place his name among the first of benefactors to letters. A few very interesting Plates accompany this translation, we say a few, because to have preserved the whole in M. Denon's work (the price in the French being more than Twenty Pounds) must have gone beyond the purchase of a large number of readers.

Among those we think particularly interesting to the Readers of the Sporting Magazine, are a representation of the ARMS of the MAMELUKES, facing page 110, Volume II. These Plates are executed by a masterly hand; and though, comparatively with the original, few in number, cannot fail being much more grateful to the eye, than even a multitude of coarser objects.

As a specimen of the Author's stile and manner, we shall at present refer our Readers to his account of the Egyptian Almehs, or Dancing Girls; the Ibis Mummies, or embalmed Birds; and the pretended charming of Winged Serpents; and, as occasion may offer, take a further opportunity of making our Readers better acquainted with these curious, interesting, and entertaining Travels.

AT Metubis (or Metabis) General Menou had business with the shechs; on which account it was resolved not to proceed further till the morrow.

Metubis, besides, is an object of learned curiosity. It is a question whether it have not been built on the scite of the ancient Metellis; and, also, whether the known and tolerated licentiousness of its manners do not evince it to have succeeded Canopus, and enjoyed a similar reputation. The search after antiquities was fruitless. The people of the place spoke of some ruins, at a league and a half to the south-east; but the evening was approaching, and the travellers, preferring their ease to the gratification of their curiosity, staid in the town. By way of pastime for the evening, they sent to the shechs, requesting the presence of a party of almehs, a sort of dancing-girls in Egypt, similar to the bayaders of Indostan. The government of the place, of which they, perhaps, may be said to make a part, raised difficulties against their attendance. Polluted by the eyes of infidels, their reputation might diminish; possibly, their station be lost: a specimen this, of the contempt in which a frank is held by a moslem; since, here, the most corrupt of the community were to be defiled by his very looks! However, the presence of the General, and especially of two hundred soldiers, removed the obstacles. The almehs arrived, and did not appear to have any share of the political or religious scruples of the shechs. They denied, however, with a pleasing gracefulness, what the French thought the least of favours, such as that of discovering their eyes and lips, for all the rest was negligently free; and they soon seemed to forget concealment, clothed as they were with coloured gauzes, and ill-fastened girdles, which, every now and then, they carelessly tightened, with a playfulness that had something in it agreeable, and that reminded the French of their own countrywomen. They had brought two instruments, the one a bag-pipe, and the other a tambourine, made with an earthen pot, and which was beat with their hands. They were seven in number. Two began to dance, while the others sung, accompanying themselves with castagnettes, in the form of little cymbals, of the size of a crown-piece: the motion by which these were rattled against each other, displayed the fingers and wrists of the almehs to great advantage. Their dance began voluptuously, and soon became lascivious. It was no longer any thing but a gross and indecent expression of the ecstasy of the senses; and, what rendered these pictures still the more disgusting was, that at the moment in which they kept the least bounds, the two musicians, with the bestiality of the lowest women in the streets of Europe, disturbed with a coarse laugh the scene of intoxication that terminated the dance.

They drank brandy in large glasses, like lemonade; and though young and pretty, they were for the most part, worn-out and faded.

The almehs, notwithstanding their dissoluteness, are received into the harems of the most respectable part of the community, as the tutors of young ladies, in every agreeable accomplishment. They give lessons in dancing, singing, the graces, and every pleasurable art; nor is it surprising that, where voluptuousness is the principal occupation of women, those of the sex who make a profession of gallantry, should be the instructors of the rest. They are introduced at the entertainments given by the great among themselves; and when a husband would spread festivity through his harem, the almehs are called upon to assist.

The caverns of Ssakkarah had been opened, and a sepulchral chamber, containing more than five hundred ibis-mummies, discovered. Two of these urns were given to M. Denon, and he could not resist the desire of opening one.

The pots which enclose these birds, are of a red and common earth, of from fourteen to eighteen inches in height; their form bears a general resemblance to a sugar-pot; they are found in great numbers at Ssakkarah, in subterranean chambers; these chambers are so dry, that the pots on being taken out appears still new, and that their antiquity might be doubted if the art of embalment were not lost, and if the bird whose mummy is found had not left the soil of

Egypt:

Egypt: it is said that a few are sometimes seen in the lake Menzaleh, between Damiatt and the ruins of Pelusium: but M. Denon, in spite of reiterated inquiries of native sportsmen, and of those who made researches in natural history their peculiar object, found no person who could assure him of his having seen one.

On proceeding to open the pot, and the mummy it contained, the solder which fastened its lid, and which was made only of a kind of chalk, gave way with a slight effort. The enswathed bird was loose in the pot; and this explains the state of pulverization in which mummies of this kind arrive in Europe, after the justlings of their journey. At first sight, the mummy of an ibis appears like that of a new-born infant: a fine cloth, of a bister-tint, and which appears to have been soaked in an aromatic fluid, after being crossed over the lower part of the body, covers the whole of one side; under this envelope, a double thread binds the mummy, horizontally and transversally, in the manner of a net, in all its parts; under this thread, the second envelope resembles the first, swathing the body in a similar manner; below this are little bandages, of an inch and an half in width, which, like the thread, are wound round the bird in every direction. The bandages removed, a third swathing is discovered, under which are little pellets of cloth, adapted to the inferior part, and so placed as to maintain the form of the mummy, and increase its consistence; all this taken away, the mummy assumes the figure of a pupa or chrysalis, ready to expand its wings; this last envelope, much coarser than the former, and dipped in a thicker balm, had received a colour of a deeper brown, and a substance less pliant; the form is here somewhat visible: this envelope was opened; but, as if the material employed had been applied in too hot a state, or that it had some corrosive quality, it had carbonized every thing to which it had penetrated, and the bones fell into powder as soon as they were uncovered, or as soon as it was attempted to detach them from their adherence to the cloth, or to the embalming matter. The wish to render the research complete, induced M. Denon to open his second pot; in this was found a larger, compacter, and heavier, mummy: there was this difference in the envelopes of the second, that, instead of a swathing for its innermost covering, it had bands of two colours, alternately crossed by threads symetrically enveloping the little bundle as before. M. Denon also observed a little cockade, fastened on the side, near the top, and which at first appeared a fanciful ornament, but which was found to be a little bandage, wound up, and fastened to the bundle by the gluten of the balm: he has since had opportunities of observing that it was in this manner the embalmer, perhaps after finishing his operation, scrupulously enveloped and attached to the general mass the little fragments of feathers which had been separated under his hands, so that no part of the animal should be lost. This minute care manifests that the Egyptians joined religious ideas with their embalments; and it helped to explain to him, in the sequel, the meaning of the little mummies that he found in company with embalmed human bodies which he opened. All the other envelopes of the second mummy were the same as those of the first;

first; the last did not adhere, and under it was found a skeleton, without a fragment of any one of the most delicate bones. The feathers of the head and beard were preserved; it might be seen, notwithstanding the alteration of their colour by the balsamic liquor, that the upper part had been white, and the extremities of a red-brown; the tail short, with feathers of little strength.

Serpents with wings are no longer thought of in Egypt; but this animal is still an occasion of delusion. Psylluses were one day introduced at the palace of the commander in chief; several questions were put to them relative to the mysteries of their sect, and their connexion with the serpents whom they appeared to command; they displayed more audacity than intelligence in their replies: resort was had to experiment: "Can you discover," said the commander in chief, "whether there be any serpents within this palace? and, if there are, can you oblige them to come out of their retreat?" They replied in the affirmative to both questions: they were put to the proof; they went through the apartments; a moment after, they declared that there was a serpent; they re-commenced their research to discover where it was, fell into a few convulsions on passing a jar placed in one of the chambers of the palace, and pointed that the animal was there; in fact, it came forth. This was a true Comus's trick; the French watched them, and were convinced that they were very skilful.

Always curious to observe the means which men employ to influence opinion, M. Denon had regretted his not having been at Rashid at the time of the procession of the feast of Ibrahim, wherein the convulsions of the psylluses is the part of the ceremony which interests the public the most; to obtain an equivalent for his loss, he addressed himself to the head of the sect, who was keeper of the okal or warehouse of the Franks: he flattered him: the psyllus promised to make him a spectator of the ecstasies of a psyllus into whom, according to his expression, he was to breathe the spirit. In his curiosity, he imagined, he discovered an inclination to proselytism, and proposed initiation. M. Denon accepted it; but having learned that in the ceremony of reception, the grand-master spat into the mouth of the neophyte, the idea of this circumstance cooled his desire, and he felt that it would not be firm enough to stand the trial; so, giving some money to the keeper of the okal, the grand-master promised to let him see an inspiration. In a word, the moment arrived; the chief of the psyllusses came to him in all the gravity of his supremacy; he was clothed in a long robe, of which the magnificence was relieved by the indifferent raiment of three of the initiated who accompanied him, and who had only a few rags on their bodies.

They had brought some serpents; they put them out of a leathern bag in which they had them confined, and, by irritation, caused them to rise and hiss. M. Denon remarked that they were principally irritated by the light; for as soon as their anger ceased, and they no longer attempted to bite, they had this peculiarity, that below their heads, for the length of six inches, anger dilated their skin to the width of a hand. He clearly saw that he should, for the future, be as little fearful of the bite of a serpent as a psyllus; for, having carefully carefully remarked that in attacking them with one hand they seized them close the head with the other, he, to their great scandal, did all that they had done, and without danger. From this juggle they went to the grand mystery: a psyllus took one of the serpents, the lower jaw of which he had previously broken, and of which he further scraped the gums till the whole palate was gone; this done, he laid hold of it with an affectation of transport, approached the chief, who, with that of gravity bestowed on him the breath, that is to say, that after some mysterious words, he breathed in his mouth; instantly the other, seized with a holy convulsion, his arms and legs distorted, his eyes starting from his head, began to tear the animal with his teeth; and his two supporters, who held him with difficulty, moved by what he seemed to suffer, tore from his hand the serpent, while he resisted the attempt; as soon as he was separated from it, he remained as if in stupor: the chief approached him, muttered a few words, resumed the spirit by aspiration, and he returned to his natural state; but he who had obtained possession of the serpent, tormented with eagerness to consummate the mystery, demanded the breath likewise; and, as he was more vigorous than the former, his cries and convulsions were still stronger and more ridiculous. M. Denon believed himself initiated, and the juggerly ceased.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.

A FRAGMENT.

[Part of a Letter.]

.... AND then we went to Bartlemy Fair; but it was at night, and so we did not see the Lord Mayor take—I mean partake—of a cool tankard with the keeper of Newgate, and which I could never understand the meaning of. But we saw—nay, if I were to attempt telling all we heard! Homer's Ship List would be a bagatelle to the former, and the Tower of Babel a piece of still life compared with the latter.

No! I will confine myself to noting the remarks made by various people, en passant, and which sometimes had the effect of cross readings in a newspaper.

—"Only look, mother! there's a man eating pie with a fork, just as you would sprats from a gridiron!"—"Ah, child, I warrant he's seasoning himself for another place, where he will have that to his food which he won't like—brimstone sauce!"

"Dear me, cousin, what dancing is there!"—"Dancing, indeed! and so near Newgate! I'm quite shocked!—Do these vain people never think of the poor creatures that dance upon nothing? I would not for the world dance down 'Go to the devil and shake yourself' in this neighbourhood for the world; I should think it ominous!"

"Come now, let's pop into Pidcock's, and see the wild creatures."—"The wild creatures! that's good!"—why, don't you see the wild creatures are all on the outside?"

"I protest, as I am a woman, I never was better entertained in my life; the solo, as they call it, on the salt-box, beats our Dick's tattoo hollow—you remember our Dick's tattoo on a winter's night—and then the salt-box man has such a comical drumstick!"—"Och, my dare, that's nothing at all to the salt-boxes we have in dear Dublin—to be sure, this is very well for a thing in miniature—but a Dublin tattoo—it would do your heart heart good to see a Dublin tattoo!"

"I say, mistress, what do you charge for twopenny-worth of those sausages?"—This was asked by a smart city apprentice, whose mamma says he is the most brilliant wit in all the enlightened regions of Candlewick Ward.

"Now, only let us step into Saunders's, and see Pizarro; it won't take us much more than a quarter of an hour, and it is so much better than Drury-lane."—"O no, not I—I hates all Plays but at Common Garden; I tells you Common Garden's the gig, the go, and the finish!"—Why, where the devil's Punch this year? Ha! yonder's the man for my money; my old friend, the merry Andrew—Come, Nan! this is the right Bartlemy show: it will make you laugh ten times more than Pizarro."

"Indeed, my friend, I can proceed no farther; this hideous noise, this intolerable discordance distracts me; one may say with Frederick in the Tempest—

"Surely hell's broke loose, and all the devils are here!"

"I say, Pat, they talk of putting down Bartlemy Fair."—"The devil they do!—What! put down the only good thing in the city! I say, God bless the King! but if they put down Bartlemy Fair—O! why, there's an end of Old England, that's all!"

"Did nobody see nothing of never a little dog nowhere?"—"A long-tailed pig, a short-tailed pig, or a pig without ever a tail?"—"No, master, no; a pretty little dog"—"D—n the dog! do you think as how I sells puppies?"

"Look, look! if there is not a man vomiting ribbons!—What a pity it is he did not come time enough for the election! He'd have made a rare penny of it! I wonder whether he's for Mainwaring or Burdett?"—"Pooh! it's all a trick."—"What, the millers' votes! Well, I know that; but"—

"Walk in! walk in! here's the superb wax work; the Dead Alive! here you may see all the Kings in Europe."—"I says, master, have you got Bonaparte there?"—"O yes, Sir, here is Bonaparte and Talleyrand, and Charles Fox, and"—"Ha! ha! ha! a pretty list of Kings, to be sure!"

"What angelical angels in that coach!"—"Angelical devils! Don't you know them? Why, 'tis Charlotte, Sophia, and Selina, from King's Place."—"What, do they come to Bartlemy Fair?"—"They! why, this is their proper element: Men eating fire—Women drinking gin—noise, confusion, hell, and the devil! Lord! they are as much at home here, as in mother W———'s back parlour."

"Where are my spectacles?—O abominations! Aye, this is one of dear John Bunyan's Visions: this is Vanity Fair.—Good lack! I've drop't my silver spectacle case"—"Ay, grandmother, and a man has snatched it up in a minute."—"Well, child, ask him for it"—"Ask him! why, he's run away."—"A thief! a thief! Come, child, let's get home—O that I had been content with reading the Pilgrim's Progress, and have kept away from Vanity Fair!"

"You may depend upon it, my dear Sir, that even in these mummeries we are greatly improved. In the time of Pope, the Smithfield Muses were miserable hags of dullness.—"No doubt, Sir, no doubt; but I should be glad to know, whether the regular theatres have improved proved in proportion?"—Why, Sir, in morals, but not in wit; in scenery, but not in manners: we have no fine gentlemen, and as to our ladies ....

Instinctive Affection of Partridges for their Young, &c.

From White's Works in Natural History; and Observations by W. Markwick, Esq. Two Volumes Octavo.

"A Hen partridge came out of a ditch, and ran along shivering with her wings, crying out as if wounded, and unable to get from us. While the dam acted this distress, the boy who attended me saw her brood, that was small and unable to fly, run for shelter into an old fox-earth under the bank. So wonderful a power is instinct."—White.

"It is not uncommon to see an old partridge feign itself wounded, and run along on the ground, fluttering and crying, before either dog or man, to draw them away from its helpless unfledged young ones. I have seen it often, and once in particular I saw a remarkable instance of the old bird's solicitude to save its brood. As I was hunting a young pointer, the dog ran on a brood of very small partridges; the old bird cried, fluttered, and ran tumbling along just before the dog's nose, till she had drawn him to a considerable distance, when she took wing, and flew still farther off, but not out of the field; on this the dog returned to me, near which place the young ones lay concealed in the grass, which the old bird no sooner perceived than she flew back again to us, settled just before the dog's nose again, and, by rolling and tumbling about, drew off his attention from her young, and thus preserved her brood a second time.

"I have also seen, when a kite has been hovering over a covey of young partridges, the old birds fly up at the bird of prey, screaming and fighting with all their might to preserve their brood."—Markwick.

What relates to the Hybrid Pheasant is more important. Hybrid birds are peculiarly rare; and the above suggestion is well founded.

"Lord Stawell sent me, from the great lodge in the Holt, a curious bird for my inspection. It was found by the spaniels of one of his keepers in a coppice, and shot on the wing. The shape, air, and habit of the bird, and the scarlet ring round the eyes, agreed well with the appearance of a cock pheasant; but then the head and neck, and breast and belly, were of a glossy black; and though it weighed three pounds three ounces and a half, the weight of a large full-grown cock pheasant, yet there were no signs of any spurs on the legs, as is usual with all grown cock pheasants, who have long ones. The legs and feet were naked of feathers, and therefore it could be nothing of the grouse kind. In the tail were no long bending feathers, such as cock pheasants usually have, and are characteristic of the sex. The tail was much shorter than the tail of a hen pheasant, and blunt and square at the end. The back, wing feathers, and tail, were all of a pale russet, curiously streaked, somewhat like the upper parts of a hen partridge. I returned it, with my verdict, that it was probably a spurious or Hybrid hen bird, bred between a cock pheasant and some domestic fowl. When I came to talk with the keeper who brought it, he told me that some pea-hens had been known last summer to haunt the coppices

and coverts where this mule was found.

"Mr. Elmer, of Farnham, the famous game-painter, was employed to take an exact copy of this curious bird.

"N. B. It ought to be mentioned, that some good judges have imagined this bird to have been a stray grouse or black cock; it is however to be observed, that Mr. W. remarks, that its legs and feet were naked, whereas those of the grouse are feathered to the toes." —Markwick.

Mr. Latham observes, that "pea hens, after they have done laying, sometimes assumes the plumage of the male bird," and has given a figure of the male-feathered pea-hen, now to be seen in the Leverian Museum; and M. Salerne remarks, that "the hen pheasant, when she has done laying and sitting, will get the plumage of the male." May not this Hybrid pheasant (as Mr. White calls it) be a bird of this kind? that is, an old hen pheasant which had just begun to assume the plumage of the cock."

"A neighbouring gentleman sprung a pheasant in a wheat-stubble, and shot at it; when, notwithstanding the report of the gun, it was immediately pursued by the blue hawk, known by the name of the hen harrier, but escaped into some covert. He then sprung a second, and a third, in the same field, that got away in the same manner; the hawk hovering round him all the while that he was beating the field, conscious, no doubt, of the game that lurked in the stubble. Hence we may conclude, that this bird of prey was rendered very daring and bold by hunger, and that hawks cannot always seize their game when they please. We may farther observe, that they cannot pounce their quarry on the ground, where it might be able to make a stout resistance, since so large a fowl as the pheasant could not but be visible to the piercing eye of a hawk, when hovering over the field. Hence that propensity of cowring and squatting till they are almost trod on, which no doubt was intended as a mode of security; though long rendered destructive to the whole race of gallinæ by the invention of nets and guns." —White.

"Of the great boldness and rapacity of birds of prey, when urged on by hunger, I have seen several instances; particularly when shooting in the winter, in company with two friends, a woodcock flew across us, closely pursued by a small hawk: we all three fired at the woodcock instead of the hawk, which, notwithstanding the report of three guns close by it, continued its pursuit of the woodcock, struck it down, and carried it off, as we afterwards discovered.

"At another time, when partridge-shooting with a friend, we saw a ring-tail hawk rise out of a pit with some large bird in its claws; though at a great distance, we both fired, and obliged it to drop its prey, which proved to be one of the partridges which we were in pursuit of; and, lastly, in an evening, I shot at, and plainly saw that I had wounded a partridge, but it being late I was obliged to go home without finding it again. The next morning I walked round my land without any gun, but a favourite old spaniel followed my heels. When I came near the field where I had wounded the bird the evening before, I heard the partridges call, and seeming to be much disturbed. On my approaching the bar-way they all rose, some on my right and some on my left hand; and just before, and over my

my head, I perceived (though indistinctly from the extreme velocity of their motion) two birds fly directly against each other, when instantly, to my great astonishment, down dropped a partridge at my feet: the dog immediately seized it, and on examination I found the blood flow very fast from a fresh wound in the head, but there was some dry clotted blood on its wings and side; whence I concluded that a hawk had singled out my wounded bird as the object of his prey, and had struck it down the instant that my approach had obliged the birds to rise on the wing; but the space between the hedges was so small, and the motion of the birds so instantaneous and quick, that I could not distinctly observe the operation."

More Foot-Racing.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

Gentlemen,

LOOKING over several Newspapers since the 11th, I found, to my astonishment, an account of a foot-race being run at Newton, in Lancashire, by a man of Saddleworth, and a man of Oldham, Lancashire, stating, that the Saddleworth man staked fifty guineas to forty, and beat his antagonist more than a quarter of a mile, running the distance of three miles in thirteen minutes and fifty seconds, and could continue that pace for ten miles. All this is extremely erroneous: I was an eye-witness to the performance, which was as follows: — The Oldham man, namely, Pollit, staked fifty guineas to forty, and won by rather more than two hundred yards; time, fourteen minutes and thirty seconds. The course was three hundred and sixty yards short of three miles. Pollit won with great ease, being the third race he has won since the 18th of April this year, viz.

April 19th, He ran one Berry over Knutsford Course, in Cheshire, one mile, for fifty guineas, which he won with ease; time, four minutes and forty seconds. Again, May 31, he beat one Cash over Knutsford, one mile, fifty guineas each; time, four minutes and forty-five seconds; and August 25, he beat the above Saddleworth man. He never was beat by any foot-man whatever, except by the famous Abraham Wood, who ran at York against Brown of Yorkshire. He is son to the famous Pollit, of racing memory, who, though forty-nine years of age, ran, August 9, this year, for forty guineas, one mile, against six minutes, over Knutsford, which he performed in five minutes and thirty-two seconds. Your's,

The Game of Whist.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

Gentlemen,

AT a party at whist a few evenings since, one of the company dropped a card; in stooping to pick up which, Counsellor G—— saw two cards, the king and the queen, which he immediately called—the opposite party denied the right of their opponents to call them: as this point is not determined by Hoyle, I shall be much obliged to you, or any of your sporting friends, if you will settle the point, whether the seeing two cards gives a right of calling them? Hoyle expressly says, if cards be separated and seen, the opposite party has a right to call them. I am, Sir, your's, &c. A. B.

FEAST

FEAST OF WIT; or, SPORTSMAN's HALL.

A Nobleman being asked by Queen Mary, who had long promised him a consideration for his services, "What wind blew him to Court?" answered, "Two: the first was my desire that I might see your Majesty"—"I thank you for the compliment," returned the Queen. "Pray what was the other?"—"Why, that your Majesty might see me."

A stoppage took place on Thursday, on the Exchange, which produced some confusion, though without alarm. The firm in question had been long looked up to, and regarded for its punctuality. In plain terms, at the hour of one, the Exchange clock protested against giving its usual information!

Advertisement copied from the Monaghan Paper, Ireland:—"Whereas John Hall has fraudulently taken away several articles of my wearing apparel without my knowledge, this is therefore to inform him, that if he does not forthwith return the same his name shall be made public."

A young man, of the name of Neck, was married last week, in Devonshire, to a Miss Heels. They are now tied Neck and Heels.

An Irishman having purchased a pair of shoes at a ready-made shoe-warehouse in Holborn, discovering when he got home that they were not fellows, cried out, "By St. Patrick the scoundrel has sold me a pair of odd shoes!"

Mr. K. the gardener, who had lately put on the connubial yoke, was asked by a Friend if he continued to reside in the same mansion in which he had lived so many years as a Bachelor—"Yes, I do (said he), notwithstanding my Wife has converted it into a hot-house."

A celebrated Gaming House at Paris has two gates, over one of which is inscribed "HOPE," and over the other "DESPAIR." It is almost needless to add, that the Adventurers enter at the first, and exeunt at the last."

A Frenchman at Mentz, expressing his surprise that there were less fires in Germany than in France, considering the Germans were so habituated to drinking, a person observed, there was no just ground for his apprehension, as it only proved, that the Germans, when drunk, had more sense than the French, when sober.

The French having lately sent a General Vial, as their Envoy to Malta; to counteract him, or in other words, to stop him up, one of our wags proposed that we should send the Earl of Cork. This would be something like the retaliation of Frederic of Prussia; the French government having sent him an Ambassador without an arm, he next day dispatched one to Versailles with a wooden leg!

A young lady was lately reproaching another with not having been at any of the Watering Places —"Dear

—"Dear me!" cried the other, very innocently, "I have been above three miles on the Paddington Canal!"

A Schoolmaster lately sent in a bill to a country magistrate, with the following item:—"To teaching your worship to read the Riot Act, two guineas!"

Among the latest English presents to the First Consul of the French Republic, were a Fox and a Hare. The Fox has been often chased, and the Hare has been hard run; but as Bonaparte is not a very waggish sportsman, it is hoped he will not make game of them.

In a conversation which lately took place in the St. Andrew's public house, at Wapping, Paddy, who had a wooden leg, was asked by Sawney through what accident he was reduced to resort to that substitute?—"Indeed I don't know, (said he) my father and grandfather had wooden legs; I can only say, that I believe it runs in the blood!"

A glover, who had lately opened a new shop in his line in a country town in the west of England, was advised by a friend to advertise in a newspaper. No, said he, I think that a hand-bill is better suited to my business.

Bon Mot.—Mr. Mingay, in the Court of King's Bench, some time before his releasement from the bar, made a good application of an old pun. The cause was between a Tailor and an Attorney. His client found, he said, that it was not possible to make a Coat for a Lawyer without its ending in a Suit.

When Sir Toby Butler, the celebrated Irish Wit, was raised to the Bench, an acquaintance met him on his return from the Connaught circuit—"Where have you been, Sir Toby?"—"Where have I been, (repeated the Judge) why, then, since you must know, I have been hanging and transporting one half of my relations."

Droll Equivoque.—A gentleman passing through High-street, St. Giles's, observed to his friend that the glass was very high. "Indeed it is," quoth an Irish labourer, who happened to hear him, "a halfpenny higher than it ought to be!" One thought of Fahrenheit, the other of gin.

A gentleman was lately asked for a description of a lady to whom he was paying his addresses; he said, she was full of charms; for she was beauti-ful, duti-ful, grace-ful, play-ful, fanci-ful, and care-ful.

The following Epitaph was written by a country wit on a young man, whose name was Calf.

All Christian men in his behalf,
Pray for the soul of Master CALF;
For cruel Death, that subtle fox,
Let him not live to be an ox—
To crop Love's rose, or taste its thorns,
Or feel, perhaps, the curse of horns.

A person was once tried before Lord Coke, on a charge of having written a book in folio, which contained a number of seditious expressions, of which, after a long trial, he was acquitted. His lordship observed, "That the writer had like to have brought himself into a snare by a folio, but—looking to the Twelve Jurors—that he escaped by a duodecimo.

Some years ago a person requested permission of the Bishop of Salisbury to fly from the top of the spire of that cathedral. The good Bishop, with an anxious concern for the man's spiritual, as well as temporal safety, told him he was very welcome to fly to the Church, but he would encourage no man to fly from it.

SPORTING

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

A Sturgeon, of the kind called the Common Sturgeon, was taken in the river Severn, near Shrewsbury, on Sunday the 12th of September.—It had eleven knots or scales on the back, and two rows on each side; measures, in length, eight feet six inches, in girth three feet four inches, and weighs one hundred and ninety-two pounds.—This is the species, the flesh of which, when pickled, is highly esteemed as a luxury in most parts of Europe. It is said to ascend the large rivers to spawn, and is often accidentally taken in salmon nets. It never attempts to seize any of the finny tribe, but lives by rooting at the bottom of the sea, where it makes insects and sea-plants its whole subsistence. From this quality of floundering at the bottom it has received its name, from the German verb floeren, which signifies to wallow in the mud. When it is cut open, nothing is found in its stomach but a kind of flimsy substance, which has induced some to think it lives only on water and air; and hence there is a German proverb, applied to a man extremely temperate, "he is as moderate as a sturgeon."

On Tuesday, the 14th of September, was killed in the parish of Chudleigh, Devonshire, after a sharp chase of one hour, by the pack of harriers belonging to that town, a most beautiful white hare, after having eluded the pursuit of a famous pack of hounds several times last season; it was started on the ground of Mr. Joseph Pike, within the manor of Chudleigh, and when killed, was immediately presented to the Right Honourable Lord Clifford, at Ugbrook, as Lord of the said Manor.

A partridge, with the whole of its plumage perfectly white, was, on Wednesday the 15th of September, shot at Little Durnford, near Salisbury.

An inhabitant of a large village in Cambridgeshire, near Newmarket, has taken out a certificate for killing game, and actually goes out shooting with his pointer and gun, although he at this time has three shillings weekly allowance from the parish as a pauper, and during the last year received four shillings and sixpence weekly.

A gun-maker in Dublin, at the bottom of a finely-flourished card, has the following nota bene—"Duelling Pistols, engaged to hit point-blank at a proper distance."

Berne, June 24.—On the 21st, the peasants of Emmenthal brought into this town a large bear, which they killed five leagues off. This animal, which from its teeth should be old, weighs three quintals. Such a quadruped has never been found, at a similar season, near the capital.

A gentleman, just arrived from

Botany

Botany Bay, has brought over a Kangaroo with him six feet high, and so tame, that he worked on board ship as dexterously as any of the crew. He spars and fights with as much science as the best bruiser. His arms are short, but if he once grapples his antagonist, he kicks him to death. The owner offers to fight him against Belcher for two hundred pounds. In such case, the Ruffian is to be his second, and the young Savage his bottle-holder. This proposed match occupies the attention of the sporting fraternity at present; the Kangaroo the favourite. Bartholomew is very indignant at the idea that his friend Belcher should demean himself by fighting with the gem'man of the woods.

Early on Tuesday morning, the 24th of August last, a desperate battle was fought at Shipston-upon-Stower, Worcester, between a tailor, and a sadler and cap-maker from London, two noted bruisers, now residing in the above town, when, after a severe engagement, the latter, notwithstanding his skill in the pugilistic art, declined the contest in favour of his bodkin adversary, who was thereupon declared the champion of Shipston.

On Tuesday, August the 24th, Mr. Fletcher Read, a gentleman of considerable fortune, and particular patron of the pugilists of the present day, gave a dinner, at the One-Tun public house in St. James's market, to a number of the professors of the fist. Berks was of the party. In the course of the day Belcher called in, when Mr. Read addressed Berks, and told him he must now be convinced it was impossible for him to beat Belcher, and entreated him to give Belcher his hand, which he consented to do, and they sat down at the same table, and spent the remainder of the day in good humour. Berks asserted, that he found no bad effects from the late fight, except being stiff; that he was not bruised in any part of the body, and would run for a wager with any man. Upon this Mr. Read made a match between Berks and Jack Ward, the son of Will Ward, to run one hundred yards, in the shortest time, for two guineas, which was agreed to, and the parties adjourned into Hyde Park to decide the wager, when they were started by Mr. Read. Berks beat his opponent by five yards, to the no small gratification of his friends.

The late pugilistic contest between Belcher and Berks has found its way into the French papers; but as the translator was unable to explain the technicalities of the art, the Parisians are puzzled to develope the meaning of "cross-buttocks, straight ones, closing day-lights," &c. It is rumoured, that Belcher has been invited over to give a practical definition; and no doubt the hardy champion will be complimented by his brother in arms with a shake by the hand, or, in the Gallic phrase, "a fist of honour."

The breed of horses is now become an object of the most serious attention in France; but our Gallic neighbours, though they ran faster than we on the sands of Egypt, will ever be outstripped on the plains of Newmarket.

Cudgel Playing.—At Blandford Races the company were entertained with cudgel-playing, between a Shropshire lad and a youth of the town. A ring was formed, and at one o'clock the diversion of breaking heads commenced. The combatants were not, in point of appearance, well matched, the Blandford youth evidently having the the advantage of his opponent in respect to size and strength. In addition to which, he was flushed with victory, having broken four heads at the Races last season. All the knowing ones betted high on the favourite, at the commencement; but finding that his adversary fought with his left hand, and that with singular dexterity, the bettings changed from two to one; after the second round, to even bettings The fourth round decided the match in favour of the Shropshire lad, who left his antagonist for dead on the field of battle. The blows were principally thrown in on the ribs on the right side.

On Saturday, the 4th of September, a foot-race was run on Knutsford Race Course, between young Leicester, a butcher in Knutsford, (aged twenty years) against Poole, a shoemaker of the same place, one hundred and twenty yards, which was won by the former with great difficulty. Even betting. The winner performed it in fourteen seconds and a half.

In consequence of the above being so strongly contested, another match was made by the two competitors, to run the same ground and distance on Monday the 6th of September, which was won by young Leicester, beating his antagonist about one yard. Five to four on the winner, who performed it in fourteen seconds.

After the last race, young Leicester gave a challenge to run any man on the ground one hundred and sixty yards, which was accepted by Dooley, a glazier, in Knutsford, to run on the following day on Knutsford Heath; which was won by the latter, beating his antagonist nearly three yards. Three to one on Dooley, who performed it in eighteen seconds. Many considerable sums were depending on all the three matches.

Young Leicester is matched to run again on Knutsford Heath, on Monday the 20th of September, against Leather, a cotton-weaver, one hundred and sixty yards; to start at five o'clock in the afternoon.—Even betting.

Match against Time.—One day last month a wager of rather a singular nature, and for a considerable amount, was determined on the road between Glasgow and Falkirk. The bet was laid between Mr. John Stobo, surgeon, in Cumbernauld, and Mr. James Smith, of the same place, that the latter gentleman could not walk, in the space of half an hour, two miles backwards. To the surprise of many present, Mr. Smith performed the walk in twenty minutes.

On Monday, the 23d of August, a foot race took place over Lantrissent Course, between one Abraham Wood, of Manchester, and William Williams, of Ruglyn, in Glamorganshire, five miles for four hundred guineas; great betting, and even at starting; after running two miles, twenty pounds to one on Wood, which won easy. Wood is matched for one thousand guineas a side, against the best Welchman in the Principality, in three months time; place of running is not named.

An Englishman and an American, at Paris, having laid a considerable bet, which of them could remain longest under water, they both threw themselves into the Seine: the Englishman remained five minutes fifteen seconds, without re-appearing; the American five minutes forty seconds. We are assured, that so good a diver has not been seen for a long time. The Englishman intends to have another trial, and means to double the the wager, which was two hundred pounds sterling.

During the Jubilee at Preston, Daniel Crosswhite, the ostler at the George Inn, in that town, after eating a hearty dinner, ate, for a trifling wager, twenty-one boiled eggs, a penny loaf, and drank a pint of ale, in less than eleven minutes, being four minutes within the given time!

Archery.—The Woodmen of Arden again met on Wednesday, the 1st of September, to shoot for their Silver Arrow. The day was rather unfavourable to their accustomed display of skill, being very windy, which gave an advantage to the strong bows. The contest lay principally between the Earl of Aylesford, General Finch, William Palmer, Esq. Charles Reppington, Esq. and the Rev. John Dilke. Much good shooting was displayed, considering the weather, and the prize was won by William Palmer, Esq. On Friday the Bugle was shot for; and the day being more calm, a very skilful and excellent contest took place. The great opposition this day, was between Thomas Featherstone, Esq. Richard Greasley, Esq. the Reverend John Dilke, and Gilbert Beresford, Esq. The hard-contested trophy was at length won by Mr. Dilke.

On Monday, the 13th of September, was finished, at Haverstock Hill, near Hampstead, a grand match of Trap and Ball, between five gentlemen of the law, and five of the gospel, which was won by the former.

Dog-stealing.—On Monday the 23d of August, Richard Kingzett, of Campden, Gloucestershire, collar-maker and tanner, was convicted before William Bateson, Esq. and the Reverend John Pelly, Clerk, two of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Gloucester, in the mitigated penalty of twenty pounds, for stealing a valuable greyhound dog, the property of Mr. Cotterell, of Campden. On searching Kingzett's premises, the dog was found in an out-house with his brains beat out, secreted under some straw, close to a lime-pit used for the purpose of tanning. The penalty was paid, and the magistrates directed one half of it to be given to the poor of the parish; and Mr. Cotterell immediately put the other half into the hands of the overseers for the like purpose.

A most extraordinary leap was taken by a horse belonging to the Seventeenth Light Dragoons, a short time since, on the Greaves, near Lancaster. As two of the men were going through the fourth division of the sword exercise, on horseback, fully accoutred, and being at full speed, one of them perceived a large hole in the ground, just before him, clapped his spurs into the horse, and cleared it. It was afterwards measured, and found to be twenty-six feet six inches over.

His Excellency the Honourable Frederick North, Governor of Ceylon, has been induced to issue a proclamation, by which all buffaloes found straying in the Marendahn, are to be shot, in consequence of the damage they do to the cinnamon trees. These creatures are very wild and savage.

The French Government draws very large supplies from the licences of the gaming houses, of which there are great numbers in Paris. One gaming-house alone, in the Palais Royal, pays one thousand louis per month, and if the sum is not paid with punctuality, the house is shut up. They play roulette, a kind of E. O. and centinels are placed at the door, as if the house belonged to some person of rank.

Anecdote.—There is an existing law in Prussia, by which it is ordained, that every individual, whatever be his condition, on meeting the post, shall give half the road. The conductor of the post diligence, lately meeting with the carriage of the King of Prussia, on his return from Memel, ordered the postillion to turn aside. His Majesty perceiving this, stopped his carriage, and severely reprimanded his conductor, telling him, that he had violated the law. The conductor endeavoured to vindicate himself from this charge, by saying, "that he should not have made way for any other person than his Majesty."—"You are the more blameable on that account," replied the Monarch, "because you have made an exception in favour of the King, who ought always to be the first to set a good example."

An Example for Stage Coachmen.—A short time since Wm. Heeley, a mail-coachman, in the service of Mr Phillips, of Exeter, found loose in the boot of his coach property to the amount of two hundred guineas, in half-guineas and seven-shilling pieces, which he very properly and unsolicited brought to his master. It appeared that the box in which they were packed, with other things, was too slight to bear their weight. The money must have been carried loose nearly two hundred miles before it was discovered; it was the property of Messrs. Nelson, St. Aubyn, and Co. bankers, Plymouth Dock, who very handsomely rewarded the coachman for his honesty.

A new mode of transferring live stock.—A Dantzic vessel had been long so alarmingly infested with rats, that the captain entertained fears for the safety of the ship and crew at sea. She not long since arrived at Liverpool, where she happened to lie near a ship taking in cheese for London; as the rats on board the Dantzicker were nearly half famished, the captain thought this a fair opportunity of getting rid of his old passengers; accordingly he placed a plank several successive nights from his vessel to the cheese ship, when the sagacious animals (attracted by the smell of the cheese) deserted the Dantzicker, and took their passage to London on board the cheese ship.

Guinea Fowl. — The following very curious fact may be depended on: A fowl of this kind always used to go out with Mr. Allgood's hounds, of Northumberland; and whenever the hounds were let out of the kennel, nothing but shutting up the bird could restrain it. The manner of its following them was by running and flying. Once it got to the distance of seventy miles from Mr. Allgood's house, and it was so fatigued with the exertion, that it was four days in returning home. In a general way it kept pace with the leading hound.

A fox lately attacked a flock of geese in the village of Cleadon, in Northumberland, but being observed, some dogs were set upon him, when to escape he took to the horse pond, among some ducks. The dogs went in after him, and after some sport, poor Reynard found himself in a wrong element and was obliged to surrender, paying for his dinner, the forfeit of his life.

The Horse Wardrobe of the First Consul of France is, perhaps, the most superb and valuable in the world. Some of the saddles of his own horses are valued at eighty thousand francs each.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

THE FIRST OF SEPTEMBER.

AT the glittering dew which bespangled
the lawn,
Aurora was taking a peep;
To rouse the keen sportsman broke forth
the clear dawn,
When up started Colin, as brisk as a fawn,
Leaving Chloe, unconscious, asleep.

And, opening the casement, he cried out to John,
His servant and old sporting crony—
"See, the Sun's getting up, and 'tis time
"we were gone;
"So uncouple the pointers, young Ponto
"and Don,
"And saddle the black-shooting poney."

Awoke by the noise, Chloe, rubbing her eyes,
Which might rival the Basilisk's charms,
Exclaim'd—"What's o'clock?" Then,
with well-feign'd surprise,
"'Tis not five!"—"Why, my Colin,
"so soon dost thou rise,
"And quit thy poor Chloe's fond arms?"

Colin quick snatch'd a kiss, smil'd, and,
shaking his head,
Cried—"The day, my sweet Chloe, re"member;"
The disconsolate fair one, then, tossing in bed,
Again courted sleep, but with pouting lip said—
"Oh! the deuce take the First of Septem- "ber!"

Fairy Camp, Sept. 1802.

Written at Cheltenham Spa, seeing many beautiful ladies waiting for the re-flowing of the spring (then dry); nor could the liquefaction of St. Januarius's blood be more welcome to Italian devotees than the appearance of the saline lymph.

ADDRESSED TO
CHELDERIA, NYMPH OF THE FOUNT.

FAR-fam'd Chelderia! who dost here
preside;
From whose deep vase salubrious streamlets
glide;
See at thy shrine impatient vot'ries
stand,
Each with a vitreous goblet in her hand,
Waiting with anxious aspect thy command.
Perhaps thy hidden source requires supply
From the primæval cisterns of the sky.

Come then, old *Glauber! with thy pow'rful aid,
And set to rights the too-retentive maid.

Ye Epsom Naiads! too, whose powers we know,
Attend, and let your milder water flow.
And, Amphitrite! from thy pebbly shore,
Send us of green-hair'd Nereids half a score;
Here, lastly, then, black Vulcan! quench thy bars,
To make new weapons for the sons of Mars,
Should Europe be again convuls'd with wars;
Whilst Venus' son is pointing fatal darts,
To pierce from these bright eyes unguarded hearts.

The prayer was heard, the water-gushing came,
And heal'd Chelderia was restor'd to fame.

AN OLD STORY IN VERSE.

WHEN Silas was young, he nothing would owe,
To his mouth and his belly, but freely bestow,
Whate'er he could get, were it ever so dear,
For Silas lov'd savory, nourishing cheer.
His cheeks they were florid, his belly was round,
His voice it was mellow, his doctrine was sound;
When he on the Gospel deliver'd his notion,
Free and loudly he spoke, and with seeming devotion;
Which so pleased his flock, they all paid attention,
His follies and foibles they seldom would mention.
They knew him their pastor, they lov'd him at heart,
For of all he possess'd he would freely impart,
Were it riches or wisdom, or good of the land,
Such he'd kindly dispense with a liberal hand.
With his flock too he'd likewise as freely partake,
Of ale, cyder, wine, beef, or pudding or cake,
His friends and his bottle he'd never forsake.

One Sunday, on charity, Silas was preaching,
How lovely its practice was earnestly teaching;
He said all he could to awaken the sinner,
Whilst Simon, his man, was a seeking his dinner.
But meeting repulses, he said, with much sorrow,
My master, and I too, must fast till to-morrow.
I've done all I can, so at Church I will call,
But ent'ring, saith Silas, well, what saith Saint Paul?
Thought Simon, my master is speaking to me,
To know whether I, Paul the butcher did see.
Paul, a Saint! stammer'd Simon! he's more like a Jew,
And I know, Sir, you'll swear, if I tell you what's true;
The man's quite uncivil, and impudent grown,
And cares not for any one's wants, but his own.
These, in short, are the words which Paul bid me tell ye,
For me he shall preach with a hungry belly;
Meat, indeed! said he, grinning, no, I'll trust no more,
Till Silas, your master, has paid the old score.

A BIRMINGHAM MILLINER's HAND-BILL.

PROUD of the favours which I daily meet,
From those fair Maids who wish to look complete,
And grateful to those Nymphs who boast of taste,
And emulate to have a pretty waist,
I've been to town to see what is the ton—
The best, the newest fashion fix'd upon;
And I've imported such an ample store
Of choicest goods, as I ne'er found before;
French and Italian vests as worn in France,
On a construction suited to a dance,
Giving such elegance of form and grace,
As captivate much more than handsome face;—
For what's a pretty face devoid of form?
'Tis that alone has every power to charm:
Then haste, ye fair, my store of goods to see,
I'll use you well for every golden fee.

twenty glasses ran off at score, (a turf expression) in a Sweepstakes, to reach the goal of health, but (crossing and jostling not being excepted) they came together in such rude contact, that, from the many simple and compound fractures, they were, on a muster, return'd unfit for service.
